Collegian's freedom of expression

By CHARLOTTE ALLEN

Freedom of expression, spoken or written - remains a political farce.

The 1st Amendment and its' problems attendant, can be a pain in the arce.

In this University community, the Mass. Daily Collegian has found itself in the midst of controversy and condemnation. I was sorry to see the self-righteous naivete with which the paper attempted to justify its' wishy-washy approach to sexism in advertising. Fridays' policy editorial on 'censorship' was an insult to the UMass women's community to whom the paper professes responsibility and sensitivity. I invite you to read between the lines with me and perhaps catch a few with their pants down, so to speak.

"In this community, the Collegian has found it somewhat less embarassing to use methods which divert attention from us to the bigger 'bad guys'. Since our capitalist social process has as its hallmark the notion of inequality and injustice, this paper, working within the confines of society, has contracted dangerous attitudes. When left untreated, these attitudes show up in practices and policies that antagonize community efforts to smash sexism.

Yet, the Collegian has often used common sense as its weapon to combat racism. Our predecessors negotiated with members of the Third World community for Black Affairs pages and an editorial vote in the Collegian Board of Editors. It took a takeover of the paper to get where they did, but there they are. The Collegian has walked among the progressives, if only donning liberal grins.

Now we have been thrown a curve ball so to speak and frankly, we are tired of, explaining, so here it is in print. Recycle and save it for the next time.

We are speaking of sexist ads. The Collegian has recently received an onslaught of ads, mainly from beer companies, which we agree are sexist. After given a hard time, we decided to censor most of them, yet turned our heads when we needed more money-space. At the same time, certain ads that did run received considerable feedback from the community and our editorial pages came alive for the first time! Sexism can be used to our advantage.

We, at the Collegian could never admit to being insensitive and irresponsible. We just don't see women's concerns as important as blacks. Luckily the women's community doesn't pose a threat to us....

We've taken great pains to treat the girls alright in the office. There's even a token Women's Coordinator to appease the libbers, but she can't vote in the Board because...duhhhh...well, they just can't have their cake and eat it too.

We asked ourselves "Does a group of 7 people have the right to determine for 20,000 what is good or bad, just or injust?" To a certain extent, we say "yes." We make extremely political decisions everyday about what is newsworthy, where a story will go, what sort of headline, etc. But when it comes to standing firmly against sexism, we haven't. We're a predominantly white-male Board and need to be pushed all the time. As long as the beer companies pay us to print their ads, we are in effect being bribed to perpetuate sexism.

The purpose of this policy editorial is to make you, the readers, do in many words what we, as a college newspaper, could do in a few. We want you to waste your time and write letters to us which we will send to the beer companies at XMass along with our holiday greetings.

sure, we all know that a nationwide boycott of these sexist ads would be overwhelmingly effective compared to all the nasty words in the book, but if we cared, we would have done something besides write this editorial in the first place."

★ Reallocation

the provost report treats separate departments as totally self contained.

"We will not have access to the linguistic and cultural background necessary to read Russian novelists," said Lawall.

Art

The art department is earmarked for an increase in faculty positions by two. Chairperson George Wardlaw said this allocation will prevent drastic curricular cuts, but future plans of new course offerings may be to be eliminated.

The current faculty members 38, [illegible]0 per cent of which are tenured. Wardlaw said there is a nationwide trend of an increased student demand for the visual arts. The demand, he said, is not for degrees. For example, Wardlaw estimated that about 50 per cent of the students enrolled in art courses at UMass are not majors.

English

Though the English department appeared to have been axed in the provost report, chairperson Richard Wells Noland said yesterday the proposed faculty cut of 11, from 89 to 82, was "not too much of a surprise" because similar plans were proposed last fall by Dean Jeremiah M. Allen.

Noland said he questions the faculty student ratio in the Provost report (9.9:1), because the figures didn't include the English graduate students teaching rhetoric. The actual radio, said Noland, hovers around 13:1.

There are currently 400 English majors, as compared to 600 four years ago.

While 77 faculty members are tenured, Noland said about 12-15 of these are very "movable", and could easily get a good job elsewhere if they are not happy with the present conditions at UMass.

Afro-American Students

The provost report apparently looks favorably upon this relatively new department, keeping its present faculty numbers steady.

Chairperson John H. Bracey said the report "does not represent a wholesale sellout to the professional schools.

Afro-American studies has been able to maintain an enrollment of 700 students annually. Bracey said there are 30 majors in the department.

Bracey also noted that only 33 per cent of his faculty are tenured, while the average rate in humanties is 75 per cent.

He termed this the UMass Afro American program as one of the top two in the United States.

Classics

The classics department will increase its faculty from 11 members to 12 according to the provost report. Chairperson Gilbert W. Lawall said there is not "no terribly negative reaction" in his department to the allocation. However, like many other humanities chairpersons, he said he is concerned about the other cutbacks, like in other departments, like slavic and Asian studies, "since all humanistic disciplines are inter related in many ways."

About 800 students are enrolled in classics. Fifty of these are majors. The faculty-student ratio is 23:1, one of the highest in the School of Arts and Sciences.

Journalistic Studies

Although journalistic studies is "administratively separated" from the English department, it was lumped with the over-tenured program in the faculty allocations of the provost report.

There are five faculty members in the journalism department which enrolls roughly 500 students, 300 of these majors. The faculty student ratio stands at 18:1.

Although the "statistics confuse the issue," Chairperson Lawrence Pinkham said it is his understanding the department "will experience modest growth over the next five years."

"We are gratified at the indication of modest growth for our department, but we are also troubled with cuts in the other humanities," said Pinkham.

Botany

The botany department, with a faculty-student ratio of 19:1, will lose two of its 21 positions in the five year plan.

It is expected that former UMass-Amherst Chancellor Oswald C. Tippo and Chairperson Carl Swanson will retire around 1982.

Swanson said the reduction can be accommodated by anticipated retirements, but "we need the right disciplines, since we are not alone as a department, we share faculty with others.

"What affects one, affects the other.

Swanson did not express satisfaction with the methods used by Provost Paul L. Puryear in planning the five year allocations.

"To have this (allocation plan) done without faculty consultation is disastrous. We're competent, able people; we have difficulty living with dictates.

"Whether the plan rises out of unionization or not, the administrative-faculty cleaverage is getting wider," warned Swanson.

He said a large number of students are served by his department at the introductory-course level. Swanson sees the field of botany as an "integrated unit," but certain fields will be vacated through any major cutbacks.

"I am very, very much concerned with this unilateral five year plan: as poor a way to run a railroad as any way I can think of."

Chemistry

Calling chemistry "a good department with a heavy responsibility for providing service courses for students majoring in other disciplines," Puryear nonetheless suggests this department should cut its faculty positions back from 35 to 33.

There is a student faculty ratio in chemistry of 24:1. The university average, noted chairperson Ronald Archer, is 17:1.

The provost memo is only a draft, but if implemented, it would spell disaster to undergraduates," warned Archer. Only faculty members teach the lecture classes, explained Archer. If certain courses are cut, "we'll have to pile students on top of each other" in the lecture halls.

The dean, said Archer, has suggested the chemistry faculty be increased to 38, not decreased to 33 as in the provost memo. 35 faculty members are now tenured.

Archer also criticized Puryear's proposal to reduce the graduate program in chemistry. The department uses its graduate students as teaching assistants in the labs. Archer said the safety of the students would be endangered in over-crowded labs, which would result from reductions in the graduate program.

Chairpersons of the following departments could not be reached over the weekend. Their responses to Provost Puryear's allocation memorandum will be printed later this week.

Humanities and Fine Arts: French and Italian, Linguistics, Music and Dance, Slavic Languages and Literature, Spanish and Portuguese, and Theater.

Natural Sciences and Mathematics: Bio-chemistry, Geology and Geography, Physics Microbiology, Polymer Science and Engineering, and Zoology.

Gunman murders ex-Yemeni official

LONDON (AP) — A gunman killed a former Yemeni prime minister, his wife and chauffeur near Hyde Park Sunday, firing a pistol through the windshield and door of their parked car.

The victims were identified as Al Qadi Abdullah Ali Al-Hajri, 65-year-old deputy chief of the North Yemen Supreme Court, his wife Fatimah, 40, and drive Abdullah Ali Al Hammami. Police used the spelling Al H[illegible].

"We have no motive but we are treating it as a killing where a politician is involved," said Jim Nevill, chief of Scotland Yard's anti-terrorist squad.

Police said the official and his wife were in London on a private visit and had been staying at the Royal Lancaster Hotel facing Kensington Gardens and Hyde Park.

The shootings occurred shortly after 11 a.m., when Hyde park was crowded with Easter tourists. Police said that after the former prime minister and his wife entered their car, a man "of Middle Eastern appearance" wearing a dark coat and baggy trousers, walked across the street and opened fire with an automatic pistol.

They reported the killer escaped into a subway station.

The murdered official, father of 10 children, was an outspoken rightist who frequently expressed opposition to uniting North Yemen with Marxist South Yemen. When he was removed from power and briefly forced into exile in 1974, more than 25 people were killed in anti-leftist riots.

He was dismissed as prime minister of the Yemen Arab Repubic in February 1974 by President Abdel Rahman al Iriani. His two years in office were marked by several violet incidents. They included the murder of a prominent member of the government and clashes between armed forces and rebels said to have been supported by South Yemen — the People's Democratic Republic of Yemen.

A number of persons convicted of subversion were executed under his government.

North Yemen is now ruled by a military regime that is trying to contend with conflicts between rival tribal and political groups. Little progress has been made toward unity with Soviet-backed South Yemen.

WHAT'S HAPPENING

Help participate in Earth Day, April 27

The Coalition for Environmental Quality is planning Earth Day for April 27 on the UMass library lawn and in the Student Union Ballroom. Earth Day is an opportunity to demonstrate our concern for the environment in many creative ways.

The day will be full of educational and recreational events of an environmental nature; topics such as solar energy, nukes, recycling, and the bottle bill. We need people to help with more ideas, publicity, and organizing.

If you care for the environment and want to participate in any way, come to the meeting tonight in Campus Center 803 at 7:30.

French stamps and auction at Stamp Club

The Amherst Stamp Club will meet tonight at 8:00 at Farley Lodge. The program for the evening will be a collection of French stamps. In addition, there will be a 47-lot auction. The auction material will be on display before the meeting. Doors open at 7:00 and guesta are welcome.

Holocaust remembrance week; films & lectures

Holocaust Remembrance Week, a memorial observance of the destruction of European Jewry by the Nazis, will be marked at UMass with a series of events from April 11 through 14.

Sponsored by the UMass B'nai B'rith Foundation and Resources Judaics, the following events are open to the public.

—April 11 - 4:00 p.m. at Campus Center (CC) 162-75, a film and slide presentation of "Jewish Life in Eastern Europe Between the World Wars."

—April 12 - 7:00 p.m. at Herter 217, a talk on "Perspectives of the Holocasut Holocaust."

—April 13 - 3:30 p.m. at the Bartlett Auditorium, a film portrayal of the holocaust called "Night and Fog."

—April 14 - 7:00 p.m. at CC 905-9, a Holocaust Memorial Ceremony.

—April 14 - 8:00 p.m. at CC 917, the documentary of the destruction of the Jewish community in Europe called "Let My People Go."

Wood technology lectures today

At UMass a series of talks and seminars will be conducted on April 11 and 12 by the Wood Science and Technology section of the Department of Forestry and Wildlife Management. The project is under the auspices of the Society of Wood Science and Technology and the National Science Foundation.

The visiting scientist will be Professor Robert J. Hoyle of the Wood Technology Section, Department of Materials Science and Engineering, Washington State University, Pullman, WA.

At an all-University Monday afternoon seminar, Prof. Hoyle will speak on "Reliability Concepts Applied to Wood Structures and Products." That evening, Prof. Hoyle will be the speaker for the 12th Annual Wood Technology Student-Alumni-Industry Dinner at the Campus Center Auditorium (CCA). His topic will be "Candid Thoughts on Technology in the Wood Building Products Industry."

Anyone wishing to meet with Dr. Hoyle should contact Herald B. Gatslick at 545-2110.

Weapons control needed, says Warnke

WASHINGTON (UPI) — Paul Warnke, chief U.S. disarmament negotiator, said yesterday the United States will pour billions of dollars into weapons development if it fails to reach agreement with the Kremlin in a "relatively short" time.

"We can continue with the arms competition or we can try and get effective arms control," Warnke said in an interview on CBS-TV's "Face the Nation" program. "I think those are the alternatives."

Warnke, noting the Soviet Union has new strategic weapons under development, said "We are in the same situation. We are prepared to follow that course if the arms control course proves ineffective."

Asked how long the United States would wait before putting substantially more money into defense failing a new arms control agreement, Warnke said, "Obviously you can't wait if the other side is going ahead, so that I would say the time span is a relatively short one. There is urgency in arms control, there's no question about it."

Asked if the United States would face another cycle where "billions and billions" of dollars are pumped into the defense budget, he replied: "That unfortunately is the consequence if you don't end up with effective arms control agreements."

But Warnke did not set a deadline for reaching a new treaty and noted the strategic arms limitation agreement expiring Oct. 3 could be extended. He said he did not intend his statements on arms escalation as a warning or threat, and is optimistic a new SALT pact will be achieved.

"I think there is at least equal urgency on that Moscow side," he said.

Warnke said he thinks Soviet leader Leonid Brezhnev, who has pushed the concept of detente, has "considerable personal investment" in reaching a weapons pact with the United States. Warnke and Secretary of State Cyrus Vance returned April 3 from Moscow, where the Soviets rejected two Carter administration proposals to limit arms. Further negotiations are planned in Geneva in May.

"I think the interests of both countries so much lie in having effective control over strategic nuclear arms that we will in fact find some means of achieving it," Warnke said yesterday.

He repeated the Carter administration's position that the next move in arms control talks is up to the Soviet Union.

While Carter publicly outlined his weapons control proposals, Warnke said negotiations on the plan will be secret because "you can't negotiate in open sessions with all the world looking on."

American family life, subject of workshops

The 1977 Copeland Colloquium, which will include lectures, panel discussions, workshops, and a play on the subject of "Family Life in America," will begin at Amherst College Wednesday with events scheduled daily through Wednesday, April 20.

Several distinguished writers will visit the campus to participate in the four panel discussions beginning at 8 p.m. in the College's Converse Assembly Room.

Panel topics and the dates they are scheduled are "Power and the Family," April 15; "Race, Class, Sex," April 16; "Risks of Caring," April 18; and "Casualties in Today's America?" on April 20.

One highlight of the Colloquium will be an appearance by the Caravan Theatre of Cambridge, Mass., in a production of "Family," to be presented at 8:30 p.m. on Sunday, April 17, in Kirby Theater.

Tickets for the play are free, but they must be reserved and picked up at the College in advance, in Room 18 of Johnson Chapel between 12:30 and 2:30 p.m. on Tuesday, April 12, or Wednesday, April 13.

Boltwood looking for supervisors

The Boltwood-Belchertown State School is seeking qualified students who are enrolled in an undergraduate or graduate program leading toward a degree at a university, college, or community college for paid student supervisor positions for the academic year beginning July.

"The project affords both the student volunteers and the people they work with recreational, educational and vocational experience.

Anyone interested in working with special needs individuals, and would like a challenging position in developing programs and supervising other volunteers then. This is opportunity to gain valuable learning experience in a supervisory capacity and to develop organizational and recruitment skills.

All interested students should contact Cindy Rogers, Coordinator of the Boltwood-Belchertown Project at Belchertown State School, 413-323-6311 extension 296, 10-12 and 3-5 before April 15, 1977. The Boltwood-Belchertown Project is an equal opportunity employer.

Facts and myths about what we eat

Professor Fergus M. Clydesdale of the department of Food Science and Nutrition, will speak on junk food, food fads, vegetarianism, and facts and myths about what we eat. The presentation will be on Tuesday, April 12, at 7:30 in the main lounge of Emily Dickinson House on Orchard Hill.

Minnesota Orchestra performs at FAC

The Minnesota Orchestra will make its first appearance in Amherst at the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall tomorrow at 8 p.m.

Known as the "Orchestra on Wheels," the Minnesota Orchestra has been heard in nearly every state in the Union and throughout Canada. Several years ago, under the State Department Cultural Program, it completed a 34,000 mile tour of the Middle East, and during the 1972-73 season, as part of its 70th Anniversary tour, the Orchestra performed four concerts in Mexico City under the sponsorship of the Mexican government.

Tickets for the concert are now on sale at the Fine Arts Center Box Office and at all Ticketron outlets and are priced at $5, $6 and $7 for the general public; one-half price for UMass-Amherst students; $1.00 off the regular price for other students and senior citizens. The Fine Arts Center Box Office is open from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. Monday through Friday, 545-2511.

DEODORANT TAMPONS
30 tampons
CAUTION:

Before you buy a deodorant tampon, read the "caution" on the package. It tells you to discontinue use and consult your physician if irritation develops or if you have a history of sensitivity or allergies.

Now, ask yourself if you want to take this risk with your body.

There is no warning on a Tampax tampon package

You won't find any warning on the Tampax tampon package. A deodorant, or cover-up scent, which may cause allergic reactions or be harmful to delicate tissues is unnecessary. When a tampon is in use, embarrassing odor does not form. So why take chances with something that isn't needed?

What's more, the Tampax tampon container-applicator — like the tampon — is flushable and biodegradable. It's as safe to dispose of as a few sheets of facial tissue. You can't say this about plastic applicators. And unlike some other tampons, Tampax tampons expand in all three directions — length, breadth and width — to adjust to your inner contours so that the chance of leakage or bypass is minimal.

No wonder Tampax tampons are the #1 choice of millions of women around the world.

Your Birthday

by Stella Wilder

Monday, April 11 — Born today, you are one of those basically inspirational people whose mere presence urges others on to their best work. You expect a great deal of those with whom you associate, just as you expect a great deal of yourself. Nor do you rest content with a single demonstration of superiority. Again and again, you demand performances that are quite out of the ordinary. Nevertheless, those whose work or play brings them into proximity with you appear eager to do your bidding; more, they are eager to go that extra mile — the mile that brings them ultimately into the ranks of those superior to their fellows. Many a successful man or woman has taken time out to give credit where it is due — to you!

Although you are rather extravagant with your affections, leaving no stone unturned to demonstrate your feelings, you never place either yourself or the object of your feelings in an embarrassing position. You are particularly responsive in your dealings with children. You know how to get to a child's level without being childish — and you know how to bring a child up to your level without having him seem unnatural or precocious. One who learns from experience when it comes to affairs of the heart, you never make the same mistake twice where romance is concerned.

You have a flair for the dramatic. You know how to pick out the precise aspect of a situation or circumstance and play it for all it's worth until you achieve through it the condition or conditions you wish. You are especially adept at making others see things as you do. Aware of your ability to create the seemingly material out of the apparently intangible, you can others believe in monsters if you choose, or saints or devils or angels — or just about anything you please.

Tuesday, April 12

ARIES (March 21-April 19) — Unless another is in the same mood for romance that you are, you can kiss your hopes of conquest goodbye! But give it a try, at least.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) — A new friend proves himself extremely valuable today. Make yourself useful around the house — your own or another's.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) — If you appear unapproachable, it will be impossible for you to gain your ends socially. Stretch out a hand in genuine friendship.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) — If you request a favor, do so in a quiet, reserved, courteous manner. This is not the time to remind another of a debt he owes you.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) — There is much to be gained in the way of inner harmony through a relationship with the elderly today. Serve an old friend well.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) — Unless you are certain that you have all the facts in the case, make no decision regarding the suitability of a new co-worker to a new job.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) — Much in the way of social popularity is yours — if you are careful to tell your story straight, but tactfully.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) — Be tolerant of another's faults. You may soon need the favor returned. This is an excellent time to mend a few fences.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) — You can accomplish precisely what you have set out to do if you will go about the initial stages of your work logically.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) — Take a wait-and-see attitude where a new co-worker is concerned. Remember that Rome wasn't built in a day. Efficiency improves by evening.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) — An involvement in the affairs of an old friend could lead to the dissolution of the friendship. Be very careful; know your priorities.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) — If you have set new goals for yourself, be careful of the first steps you take toward it. Initiate a new policy of prudence.

Watson takes title despite Nicklaus duel

AUGUSTA, Ga. (UPI) — Ending any doubts about his ability to withstand pressure, Tom Watson survived a showdown with golf's most feared competitor, Jack Nicklaus, and won the Masters Golf Tournament yesterday by two strokes.

Watson, a 27-year-old who has attracted an unfortunate reputation for wilting in the stretch, sank a 15-foot birdie putt at the 17th hole to earn the $40,000 first prize and the Green Jacket awarded to the winner of this tradition-rich southern festival.

His final round score, a 5-under-par 67, gave him a total of 276 for 72 holes, 12 under par, and made him the youngest Masters champion since Nicklaus began dominating this tournament in the 1960's.

Nicklaus, a five-time winner here, gave it a superb run.

He shot the best round of the tournament, 66. It just simply was not enough.

Three strokes behind at the start of the day, Nicklaus finally caught Watson at the 14th hole when Watson three-putted from 50 feet below the cup on the humpback green.

Playing in successive twosomes at the tail end of the field, first Nicklaus, then Watson birdied the 15th hole and parred the 16th.

At 17, a 400-yard par-4 where Arnold Palmer hit the crucial shots that enabled him to win two of his four Masters titles, Nicklaus barely missed his try for a birdie. Then Watson came along behind him, and made his.

Watson got some breathing room when Nicklaus, who heard the crowd's roar for the birdie as he walked down the 18th fairway, dumped his approach shot at the final hole into a bunker and made a bogey.

But Watson did not really need it. He made a routine par on the final hole.

Nicklaus, a Masters runnerup for the third time, finished at 10-under-par 278.

C's rally to top Cavaliers; to face Spurs in playoffs

BOSTON (UPI) — Jo Jo White and Sidney Wicks scored six points each in a 17-2 fourth quarter spurt yesterday that carried the Boston Celtics to an 115-105 victory over the Cleveland Cavaliers.

The victory — and last game of the season for both teams — assured the Celtics of meeting San Antonio tomorrow night in a best-of-three preliminary series. If San Antonio were to lose later Sunday night at Milwaukee, the first game would be at Boston. If the Spurs won, the first game would be in San Antonio.

Cleveland, which wound up with the last playoff spot in the Eastern Conference, will open its playoff series tomorrow night against Washington in Landover, Md.

Part-time referee Paul Campbell of Boston and Roger McCann of New York City oversaw the game in the absence of striking NBA referees.

Boston trailed by six, 99-93, three minutes into the final period before scoring 12 straight points to go ahead, 105-99. Dave Cowens, who finished with 27 points, got the first basket in the string while Wicks, who added 14 points, got the next two and John Havlicek (16) tied the game at 99.

Baskets by Wicks, White and Wicks again followed before Tampy Russell hit two free throws for Cleveland to draw the Cavs to 105-101.

White, who finished with 30 points, hit the next two baskets to put the game away.

Cleveland, trailing 87-86 at the start of the fourth period after leading by as many as 12 in the first half, had gone ahead 97-91 early in the final period as Austin Carr netted eight of his game high 42 points. Carr had 12 of Cleveland's 19 points in the poor shooting final quarter.

CLEVELAND (105) — Snyder 4 1-1 9, Brewer 1 2-5 4, Chones 4 2-2 10, Walker 8 2-2 18, Carr 18 6-6 42, Russell 6 5-6 17, Lambert 0 0-0 0, E. Smith 0 1-3 1, Brokaw 2 0-0 4. Total 43 19-25 105.

BOSTON (115) — Havlicek 7 2-4 16, Rowe 4 4-4 12, Cowens 11 5-6 27, White 13 4-4 30, Scott 6 0-3 12, Wicks 5 4-4 14, Saunders 0 0-0 0, Stacom 1 0-0 2, Boswell 0 2-2 2. Total 47 21-27 115.

Doubles prove to be downfall

Netmen suffer first setback

By MIKE SMOLENS
Collegian Staff

The Tufts University men's tennis team, held to a 3-3 tie by UMass in singles, went on to win all the doubles matches to give it a 6-3 win over the Minutemen Friday on the Boyden courts.

The elements, however, were the dominating forces in Friday's match. A strong, bone-chilling northwest wind hampered players from both teams and was the cause of much frustration. While warming up, the players, wearing gloves, wool hats, scarves and occasionally a down parka, looked ready for an arctic expedition, not a tennis match.

"I couldn't get a grasp on the wind. Nobody could," said Jimmy Barnhart, UMass' fifth singles player, after losing to Tufts' Mike Gelb, 6-4, 6-3. "I couldn't get going out there. Sometimes you think about the wind too much."

The Minutemen were hot in the singles matches but turned ice cold when it came time to play doubles. UMass, down 3-2 in the singles, was boosted to a 3-3 tie by sixth singles player Alan Staple, who defeated Tufts' Basil Hero, 6-3, 5-7, 6-1.

This gave the UMass a new life because, at one point, it looked as if Tufts come out of the singles on top 4-2. In this case the Minutemen would need to take all the doubles matches, which — against a team like Tufts — is virtually impossible.

Instead of coming on like gang busters, the Minutemen could not put in together and were ineffective in the doubles. UMass' first doubles team of Adam Rosen and Alan Green, in particular, played well below their level of talent in the first set which they gave to Tuft's Tom Potter and Scott Stettner by an embarrassing 6-0 score.

The UMass duo came back to win in the second, 6-2, but lost the third set, and the entire match for UMass, 7-6 in a 5-1 tie breaker. Meanwhile, UMass' second doubles team of Barnaby Kalan and Staple had lost to Tufts' Eric Wilson and John Jeka, 7-5, 6-1. This put the pressure on the remaining UMass doubles teams of Barnhart and Steve Heyl and Rosen and Green. Rosen and Green couldn't recover from their apparent lackluster attitude in the first set.

Although Tufts secured the victory after the first and second doubles matches, Barnhart and Heyl went the distance with their Tufts' counterparts, 4-6, 6-3 and 6-6 in the third set, only to lose in the tie breaker, 5-3.

In the singles, Rosen jumped to a 4-0 lead over Potter, but the Tufts player won the next five games but eventually succumbed to Rosen 7-5, 6-3.

Green, despite some problems with his backhand early in the match, took Wilson 6-4, 6-3. Kalan battled Stettner for two sets, losing 7-6 (5-4 tie breaker), 7-5. Rickey Sharton never got off the ground against Jeka and lost 6-3, 6-1.

The wind forced the players to be overly cautious at times. Said Rosen: "It makes every thing more difficult. You gotta be extra careful out there."

Oarsmen dominate Marist

By BILL CARRINGTON
Collegian Staff

The UMass men's crew team began its season Saturday with an impressive victory over Marist College in Poughkeepsie, N.Y. The crew made good showings in all events, winning decisively in the varsity eight and freshman eight races.

In the varsity event, both Marist and UMass came off the start at a cadence of 40 strokes per minute. Most crews row the start of the race at a cadence this high for 20 strokes, just to get the boat up to racing speed.

After 20 strokes, Marist indeed settled to a 36, but UMass remained at a 40 for 10 extra strokes, before settling to a 32. The cadence carried UMass into a one-length lead.

Marist, overstroking UMass by four strokes per minute, tried to come back to even the boats, the UMass took 20 power strokes and raised the cadence up to a 34.

The remainder of the race was cat and dog, with UMass holding off Marist at the finish to win by one boat length. It proved to be an especially fast race for both crews, racing with the current and with a tail wind. (UMass 5:35; Marist 5:37).

In the varsity eight for UMass wax coxwain Mark Lyle, stroke Dick Dunne, Steve Frackleton, Mike Partrige, Mike Melvin, Frank Maconi, Jim Clair, Rick Edwards, and bowman Dave Kumlin.

The junior varisty eight showed vast improvements plus the will to win, but inexperience took its toll as it was defeated by Marist's JVs by one length.

The race had been delayed by 45 minutes because of a broken oarlock. When it finally started, UMass powered out to a one-length lead, but unfortunately caught a crab (one oarsman could not free his oar from the water).

Marist took the lead as UMass momentarily lost composure. UMass got back together to move back on Marist, but not in time. Only two men in the JV eight have previous rowing experience, and one of the them (Mark Bouzianas) was out sick Saturday.

Both UMass freshman eights made a good showing, as the freshman 'A' boat destroyed Marist's only freshman eight by one and one-half lengths of open water, with the UMass 'B' boat finishing behind Marist by the same margin. A change in the lineups from last weeks race proved to be an important factor, as both boats showed improvement.

Next Saturday, the crew travels to Hartford to race Trinity College. Trinity is always one of the top Division II crews in the country.

Gorillas drub Cortland, 10-6

By BEN CASWELL
Collegian Staff

Momentum, one of the essential elements of winning lacrosse games, came early and stayed late for the UMass lacrosse team Saturday and in the end, the ultimate composition was an important victory for Garber's Gorillas over Cortland state by a 10-6 score.

"This was our best effort so far," was the way UMass coach Dick Garber characterized the victory which evened the Gorillas record for the season at 2-2.

UMass scored almost immediately off the opening face-off (11 seconds to be exact) and that all important momentum factor began to mix its magic.

Attackman Kevin Patterson took a feed from attackman Jeff Spooner (who Garber experimented with successfully at midfield) and scored his first of four goals on the day.

The goal was preceeded by about 10 seconds of crisp, fast-breaking hustle and a series of passes which began what Garber called "the midfielder's best game all season."

According to Garber, UMass dominated play much more than the 4-2 score at the end of the first quarter indicated. "A lot of our shots missed the cage," said Garber, referring to the Gorillas inability to find the scoring range and unwilling contribution to Cortland State's grabbing a 5-4 lead at halftime and a temporary hold on that all elusive momentum.

"At the half I told them," explained Garber, "as far as I'm concerned the score should be 9 or 10-2 in our favor."

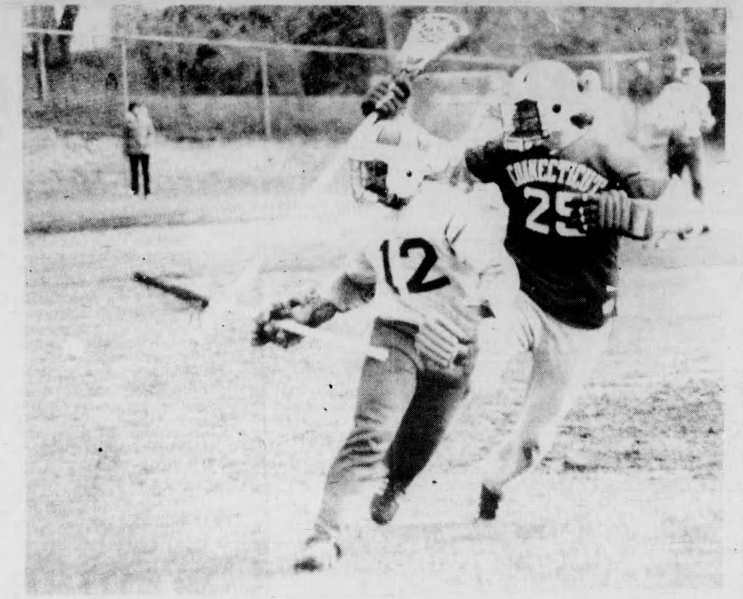
"We're playing real well, especially the midfielders," Garber told his team. Still playing well, UMass quickly found itself behind by two goals, 6-4, as Cortland State bolstered its edge about 2 and a half minutes into the second half.

Then, according to Garber, things (one of them momentum) began to go the Gorillas way and with the UMass defense also playing "one of their best games" that was Cortland State's final tally. UMass would get six more.

Finally outshooting the Red Dragons by a 43-31 edge, in the remaining time in the second half the Gorillas fired 23 shots at Cortland State goaltender Don Haefle while UMass netminder Duck Goldstein handled only 10 chances.

"Our man-down defense was excellent," said Garber. "Cortland State can score their goals. Our defense all played excellently," he said. The defensive effort, of course, included the "usual good game" from goalie Goldstein who "made some nice saves and cleared the ball well," according to Garber.

Gaining the momentum advantage in lacrosse comes from the successful completion of many aspects of the game's basic play. Not the least important of those aspects, and probably one of the most important, is a good passing game. Garber summed up UMass' advantageous use of that momentum factor best when he said, "our passing was excellent."



UMass midfielder Mike Lettera and his teammates recorded their second straight win of the season Saturday. The Gorillas will be hoping for more of the same as they face a busy week. (Staff photo Jay Saret)

Diamondmen's bats frozen; drop twinbill to Huskies

By MIKE BERGER
Collegian Staff

It was a day which would have been fun for a polar bear, an Eskimo, and a walrus. Author Jack London could have written "Call of the Wild" but overall Saturday wasn't weather fit for baseball, or any sport.

Nevertheless, the UMass baseball team fell victim to the cold, errors, inconsistent bats, some good Northeastern pitching, and certainly an inspired Husky team, 3-0 and 8-6, in a doubleheader played at Lorden Field.

The two losses humbles the Minutemen's record to 8-9 while NU, coached by John "Tinker" Connelly, finally hits the .500 mark at 3-3. Friday's game with AIC was postponed due 40 mph winds and 38 degree temperatures.

How cold was it Saturday? The Red Sox postponed their Fenway Park game with the Indians due to game-time temperature at 31 degrees. Here at Amherst, the mercury read 30 degrees with 20 mph winds.

"This is the second doubleheader in 11 years we have lost on Lorden Field. The first game's winning margin, three runs, was the first time all year we have lost by that many. Give credit to Northeastern. They are a good scrappy ballclub, who hit the ball hard today, and certainly outhustled us," said a disappointed UMass coach Dick Bergquist.

Northeastern pitcher Bob Bird got credit for the first game win by lasting six innings before being relieved by Tom Janedy and Ron Wilson. Bird's record now stands at 2-0.

Hard-luck loser Jerry Erb, now 0-3, with previous losses of 2-1 and 3-0, pitched reasonably well. He gave up eight hits, most of them scattered, but had two rough innings. Back-to-back doubles by NU's Joe Glynn and Jack Trabucco scored the first and winning run. In the fifth, Tom Whitehouse's triple brought in two more insurance runs as Erb was touched for three consecutive hits.

However, Erb finished the game strongly, setting down the last six men in order. "I couldn't loosen up the whole game and had to warm up between innings just to stay warm. When the weather is that cold, it's tough to get the ball where you want it. A lot of times, I found myself aiming it," said Erb.

Meanwhile, the UMass bats, booming the last three games prior to Saturday's first contest, were inconsistent. The team left 12 men on base, nine in the first four innings. Even though UMass had seven hits with at least one man on every inning and four base-loaded situations, Bird got tough and either struck out or got his man to pop up for the third out each time.

With righthander Jeff Reardon forced to sit out the second game due to strained rib cartilage, Bergquist went to Wednesday's winner over Holy Cross - Tom Nigro.

Nigro only lasted two and two-thirds innings, giving up three runs and four hits before being relieved by lefty Dave Tewhill.

Meanwhile, the UMass offense immediately went to work on Husky pitcher Paul Bevilaqua by scoring three runs in the first inning. Leading off the game Ed Skribiski was hit by a pitch. Paul Abramowicz singled him to second and a double by Mike McEvilly brought both of them in to score. An error by the Husky third-baseman with McEvilly running on the play produced the third run. UMass now led, 3-2.

Neal Lojek, with one out in the second, singled to center and stole second base. Skribiski walked and Abramowicz had an infield hit to load the bases. Bevilaqua was now lifted for Bob Ford, who, after Getting McEvilly to strike out, game up a bases clearing triple to Chris Koperniak. His triple gave UMass a 6-3 lead.

Tewhill, even though he was given the loss to bring his pitching record to 2-3, was a victim of the cold temperatures. Coming in after NU's Dan Columbo homered over the 375 mark in center to bring the score to 6-4. Tewhill set down the next six men on ground outs.

Colombo walked to lead off the fifth after fouling off several pitches. Trabucco hit a ground ball to second base where the fielder's grozen fingers could not find the handle. With runners on first and second and two out, NU's Tom Whitehouse hit a linedrive double the right fielder couldn't get to for the game's tying runs.

A grounder to first base was mishandled and after a walk, Huskie outfielder Chuck Mountain doubled in the winning runs.

"Dave didn't pitch badly. He was just a victim of the weather, and poor fielding," said Bergquist.

Chris Kirby came on in the sixth to finish the game by setting down the last six men and striking out two. Meanwhile, like the first game, UMass bats went dead and could do nothing against NU relievers Ford and Steve McKinnon. Ford picked up his first win of the season by pitching four three-hit, scoreless innings.

Batswomen pick up pair

The 60 shivering fans who dared to brave the gusty winds and frigid cold weren't disappointed. The UMass softball team displayed dazzling team work to edge out a tough Central Connecticut squad of 2-1 and 7-6 Saturday on the field behind NOPE.

"The past two months have really paid off. The women were confident that they could pull it off — and they did," said an elated UMass coach Dianne Thompson.

The first game was a pitchers' duel as both teams found it difficult to produce any offense in the bitter cold. UMass senior co-captain Gail Matthews pitched no-hit, no-run softball for the first five innings before Central's Deb Vesciglio broke through with a sixth inning triple. She scored on a fielder's choice, marking the only hit and run Matthews allowed.

Matthews solid performance payed off as the UMass bats were nearly as cold as the weather. They opened the first inning with four consecutive singles by Rita Riley, Rhonda McManus, Gail Matthews, and Susan DiRocco's run-scoring hit. Their bats cooled off however, as the diamondwomen could only muster two additional hits throughout the remainder of the game.

The other run came in the second inning when senior Heidi Dickson walked and advanced to second on Lynn Barry's fielder's choice. Carol Bruce, a defensive standout in the game, laid down a perfect bunt to get Dickson to third, and Riley's fielder's choice scored the first sacker.

"The defense was dazzling!" commented Thompson. "I am very pleased."

The second game of the twinbill featured many new faces, as Thompson is confident that all of her team members can do a good job.

The Minutewomen opened their scoring in the third inning. Shortstop Sandy Lunt led off with a single. Sue Peters, who had replaced Riley in the outfield, stroked her first of two triples to score Lunt. McManus, a solid performer in both games, followed with a walk. UMass had runners on first and third, a situation they have worked hard on in practice. McManus faked a steal and when the Central catcher overthrew second, Peters came in with the second UMass run.

In the fourth inning, Lunt's fielder's choice scored Dickson, who had doubled and advanced to third on a wild pitch. In the fifth, McManus belted a triple to center field, but was nabbed trying to stretch it into a homerun. The play psyched up the Minutewomen. Carter walked, advanced to second on a wild pitch, and was brought home by Pat Oski's two-base hit.

All of this set the stage for the wild final inning. Going into the seventh, UMass held a slim 4-3 lead. Two successive errors, followed by two walks produced two Central runs. Peters replaced Carter on the mound, and walked in an additional run. On the next play, the Central catcher lined out to Bruce, and the runner on third tagged up and went home. Thompson alertly spotted that the player had left third early, and an appeal play to third base resulted in the second out. Then, Peters came through to strike out the final Central batter.

In their final inning at bat, the Minutewomen were faced with a two-run deficit. Peters led off with another long triple and scored on an error. McManus drew a walk, stole second, and went to third on a wild pitch. The experienced Matthews came up to pinch hit and drew another base on balls.

The Minutewomen once again displayed heads-up base running as McManus faked a steal and was caught in a run down. She scored when the Central catcher dropped the ball. By this time, Matthews was on third, and when the opposing pitcher mishandled the ball in dead territory, the senior pitcher steamed in with the winning run to finish an exciting day of softball.

"It was one of the hardest games I've ever coached — but also one of the most enjoyable!" related Thompson. "Our aggressive baserunning and team confidence won it."

Nummo Pays Tribute To

by Michael Thelwell

"Some few women are born free, and some amid insults and scarlet letters achieve freedom; but our women in black had freedom contemptuously thrust on them. With that freedom they are buying an untrammelled independence, and dear as is the price they pay for it, it will in the end be worth every taunt and groan.

"Today the dreams of mothers are coming true. We still have our poverty and deprivation, our lewdness and our cruel toil; but we have too a vast number of women of Negro blood who for strength of character, cleanliness of soul and unselfish devotion of purpose is today easily the peer of any group of women in the civilized world. And more than that, in the great rank and file of our women we have the upworking of new revolutionary ideals which must in time have vast influence on the thought and action of the land."

W.E.B. DuBois

Seventy years ago when Dr. DuBois made this moving tribute to the black women of America, at that time just one scant generation removed from slavery, he could not have had in mind the woman who was to be his second wife, lover, friend, political ally, loyal companion, the woman who would share with him his sorest trials and greatest trimphs.

Surely those words had prophetic power lingering in his consciousness over the years finding fulfillment and enbodiment in the diminutive frame and indomitable will of Shirley Graham DuBois who died of cancer in Peking some three weeks ago.

Like her husband Mrs. DuBois will be a continuing presence in the world since there is no way that physical death can obliterate the ongoing and tangible effects of a long life of service, sacrifice and splendid accomplishment in service to humanity in general and more specifically to the advancement and liberation of the colored races of the world.

Some of those accomplishments may well be remembered here, though the mere listing of accomplishments will not come close to evoking anything of the giant spirit, the great discipline and the abounding compassion, love, wisdom and youthful energy which we came to know during the year she spent with us.

In her varied and distinguished career Mrs. DuBois has served many years as an educator. She has been the head of the Fine Arts Department at Tennessee State College and a professor of music at Morgan State College; in 1936-38 she was director of the Negro Repertory of the Chicago Federal Theatre and was the author of five plays for the American theatre; she has worked as a field secretary for the NAACP and has served as the founding editor of Freedomways magazine, 1960-1963, and as English editor of the Afro-Asian Writers Journal of Peking in 1968.

Prior to moving to Cairo, Mrs. Dubois and Dr. Dubois lived in Ghana, West Africa, where she was founder and first director of the national television agency of that country. Her books have been translated in over forty languages and have won numerous awards. They include works on the lives of Paul Robeson, George Washington Carver, Phyliss Wheatley for young readers. Her biography of Frederick Douglass — There Once Was A Slave — took the Messner-Lionel Judah Tachna award for the best book combatting intolerance in America in 1947. It was translated and published in Moscow and Peking in 1959 and a pocketbook edition was put out by the United States Navy; in 1950 the work was set in braille by the United States Army. Her other books include works on Benjamin Banneker, Pocohontas, Booker T. Washington, a memoir of W.E.B. DuBois — His Day Is Marching On — and on Gamal Abdel Nasser and Julius Nereyere. Her novel, Zulu Heart, was published in 1975.

With her husband, and afterwards by herself, she visited much of the Third World. In the countries where people were rebuilding their nations there was always something that she could contribute to the building; some way in which she could participate.

She was a friend of Kwame N'Krumah and supported his work in Ghana. She wrote biographies of her friends — Gamal Abdel Nasser and Mwalimu Julius Nereyere. She knew the leadership of China, a country for which she had a profound respect, and the year before her death was working on a book on the accomplishments of China's women.

The year she spent among us as a distinguished visiting lecturer in the Department of Afro-American studies was almost her last year. We did not know that she was sick, but it was clear that she was no longer a young woman. We thought we would have to help Mrs. DuBois to adjust and to cope. Nothing could have been sillier. Here in Amherst, as anywhere else, Mrs. DuBois contributed much much more than she accepted.

A woman advanced in age, and as we know now stricken by cancer, she maintained a furious pace. She spoke around the country, but so arranged her schedule that no one ever had to take a class for her. She asked for no favors, none. She was the first person at faculty meetings and always kept her office hours. She worked on two books while she was here, the book on women in China and a collection of photographs and biography of W.E.B. DuBois which is being brought out by Johnson Publications. She found the time and energy to act in the Black Repertory Theatre's production of God's Trombones. Everything interested her — her students, colleagues, the future of the University, and the politics of nations. Nothing was too great or too small for her serious attention.

Many of us were shamed by her energy and discipline even as were inspired by her example. In seeing her we saw something of Dr. DuBois. They must have been much alike in their ageless vitality, unflagging interests and the disciplined commitment to work, to service and to excellence, in the hatred of injustice and faith in the ultimate liberation of people. But most of all in their determination to serve rather than be served, to contribute rather than to take. This is an example we shall not forget.

Chancellor Bromery - on Mrs. DuBois

by NUMMO NEWS SERVICE

One thing which a lot of people don't recognize is that, in addition of being the wife of Dr. DuBois, Shirley Graham was herself a great person. She would have been a famous individual whether or not she was married to Dr. DuBois.

To fully appreciate her work one has to detach her career from that of Dr. DuBois. Her career as a prominant Black scholar and political activist not only compliments that of Dr. DuBois but also enables her to stand on her own merit.

One very significant concept which she advocated and which compliments her husband's ideology is the reaffirmation of the concept of the "talented tenth" — "every nation every race, every class of people have always been measured by the "talented tenth", that is the affirmation of the necessity for the leadership role of the intellectual in society, detached from the negative aspects which are usually associated with intellectualism.

As a race we, as Black people, need to encourage self expression in the written word since it lasts forever. People of African ancestry the world over are naturally very creative in the art forms however, we also need to encourage creative writing so that people outside of our societies can understand our way of life.

In closing, Dr. Bromery commented on his personal, interesting relationship with Shirley Graham DuBois. In addition to respecting her as a fantastic writer and prominent Black activist, the chancellor said that, "I understood her and loved her. She was the only person I knew outside of my family who I could relate to as my mother. In light of her fantastic ability to communicate I don't think that the five college community was fully aware of this fantastic women when she was among us."

Eulogizing Mrs. DuBois

by Casey Thelwell

"She was going to write a book on women in China. She once told me that she'd heard that in China, men hold up half of the sky. The other half is held up by women. Mr. DuBois had a profound influence on me, in fact on most of the women in our seminar on creative writing. In class once, she compared a story of mine with one by Langston Hughes, thus, the proudest day of my academic career.

Mrs. DuBois was exciting and energetic, and used many of her own experiences to teach. Because of them — the study, the travel, surely her relationship with Dr. DuBois -- she transcended, I think, what it means to be a black women in America, and so she was rather unique. The best thing about that is that she served as quite an inspiration for those of us who get discouraged. More than anything, she insisted that there are other, perhaps better, views of the world, and that literature can, and should be, a vehicle with which to examine and explore them."

We Love You

By MICHAEL JACKSON

The Committee for the Collegiate Education of Black Students would like to express its deepest regrets for our community because we have lost one of our most knowledgeable and inspiring elders. Dr. Shirley Graham Dubois was very special to us and we are going to miss her. We only hope that time that she spent here as a distinguished visiting professor in the W.E.B. Dubois Department of Afro-American Studies will be remembered by us all as a very special period in our lives. We were able to be a small part of the history of one of the most talented black women of all time. She was an author who explored thoughts and concepts and then related them to her readers in a manner that made you envious of her perceptiveness. She was a teacher who challenged her students and made them yearn for the ability to conceptualize and formulate ideas as clearly, and with as much conviction as she could. Dr. Dubois was also an historian, a social activist, and political organizer who was respected throughout the world by progressive people. This is why our program loves her and has dedictated its community service award to her. To us, her life has symbolized what one has to do prove that he-she is more concerned about helping others than in reaping accolades and monetary rewards. This is also why we asked Dr. Dubois to be the keynote speaker at our first CCEBS Family Day, and why we will be dedicating our new study lounge in her behalf. These acts help to represent not only our immense respect for Dr. Dubois, but also our close relationship with the Afro-American Studies department which was named in honor of her husband. The CCEBS program wishes you a restful sleep Mother Dubois and we hope that we will be able to live our lives as honestly and fully as you lived yours. We also hope that others will be inspired by the great service you performed while you shared yourself with us.

SUCH A WOMAN DOES NOT DIE

Shirley Graham DuBois was a woman of total political commitment, of soft-spoken eloquence, and disarming simplicty. Though she had been the wife of the greatest black intellectual in American history, and had known every important black personage of her lifetime, she had no pretensions. Instead she had somehow managed to retain a child-like openness and vulnerability to the world, which never allowed her to think or feel that she had done it all or seen it all.

During her two years at this University, she and I somehow developed the pattern of talking in my office two mornings a week before going to our respective classes. I looked forward to these times, to hearing her reminisce about Dr. DuBois, James Weldon Johnson, Julius and Ethel Rosenberg, Countee Cullen and other figures she'd known. But more than her conversation, I looked forward to being in her presence, because it was unlike any other I've known. I would look at her, marvelling at her inner strength and courage, her unwavering faith that the world could be transformed, and most of all, her sheer aliveness.

When I learned that she was dead, I felt no sorrow. She had lived a full and passionate life, because all of us who had the

When I learned that she was dead, I felt no sorrow. She had lived a full and passionate life, and what was her dying compared to her living? Nothing, really. There is no end to such a life, because all of us who had the opportunity to know her briefly carry some part of her within us now. Such was the power of the woman that her very presence made an impress on one's soul. Such a woman does not die. Only her body does, receiving the rest it has earned. Any sorrow I might feel is simply overwhelmed by the sheer joy that such a woman lived and worked among us.

His Day is Marching On:

Memoirs of W.E.B. Dubois

So it was that when, in the fall of 1935, I went to teach at A. and I. State College in Nashville, Du Bois was at Atlanta University in Georgia.

In the spring of 1936 I received a letter from him telling me that on a date about ten days hence he was speaking at a teacher's convention in Lexington, Kentucky; that he was driving from Atlanta to Nashville and would be glad if I could go on with him to Lexington, and assuring me that the convention would be of importance to me.

A few days later I received a note from the wife of a professor at Fish University, informing me that Dr. Du Bois would be their overnight guest during his short stay in Nashville and inviting me to have dinner with them that evening.

Upon receiving my immediate affirmative reply, she telephoned me saying that Dr. Du Bois would have to leave early the following morning for the drive to Lexington and that, since I was to accompany him, why did I not bring along my overnight bag and spend the night with them in the city? Dr. DuBois would then be spared the long drive out to the A. and I. campus to pick me up.

In those days there was little fraternizing between the faculties of Fisk University and A. and I. State College. Fisk definitely was the aristocrat of Negro colleges. State College faculty members did not move on the same plane.

I had never met the Fisk professor or his wife, but, I consoled myself, I had one statue advantage: I was an Oberlin graduate, and Oberlin College was the traditional "mother" of Fisk. So it was not without confidence that, clutching a neat little borrowed overnight bag, I rang the doorbell on Fisk's campus that evening. This marked the beginning.

The professor and his wife were old friends of Dr. Du Bois and they welcomed me most cordially. He was exactly as I remembered him: trim, precise, quietly elegant and twinkling. I was older now and had a better grasp of the place this man occupied, not only as a national figure but in the international arena of the affairs of men.

And I was quite ready to stand in awe of him. But he would have none of this. He greeted me as a long-time friend whom he was delighted to see. He did not embarrass me by extolling "accomplishments"; no one seemed to see anything extraordinary in the fact that this great man had invited me to accompany him to a teachers' convention. I was simply accepted into the little circle as someone who belonged. There were no other guests.

Once more, at the table, I found myself seated opposite the guest of honor, and I could watch the play of expressions on his face as he talked. But as Du Boid never allowed serious discussion to interfere with the enjoyment of good food, conversation throughout the dinner was interesting but easy for me to share.

It was after the dessert, when we were sipping coffee from small eggshell-thin cups, that he turned to his hostess and said earnestly, "You will, I hope, allow me to make the coffee tomorrow morning."

"Why, Doctor? Is something wrong with this coffee?" She was alarmed, but her husband laughed.

"Nettie, have you forgotten that coffee making is the Doctor's hobby? He considers it his chef d'oeuvre!"

Ignoring the husband's remark, Du Bois explained. "It is not that this is poor coffee — only that I make so much better. I want to give you a treat."

We were smiling but he continued gravely, saying that he had brought his own blend with him, freshly ground. Then he and the lady considered the type of coffee-pot necessary. When that was satisfactorily settled, he turned to me.

"You've never tasted my coffee, have you, Shirley? Well, you're young yet — and we'll remedy that in short order."

Early the next morning, before we set out, I drank my first cup of that coffee which in ever-widening circles became known as "the Dubois coffee." Later he taught me to make it, and friends gathered in our home drank and praised it. This was the beverage he drank every morning until the day he left me — usually two cups, to each cup two heaping teaspoons of sugar and a quantity of rich cream.

I am certain I should have enjoyed every hour of that trip no matter what the weather. It was, however, one of those perfect days in May, bringing out all the best of the Southland. As we left the city behind us, I commented on the flowering landscape and said how pleasant it was to be riding in an open car. But, I asked, would not all-day driving tire him for the lecture that night?

He laughed. "I love to drive; I enjoy nothing better than getting out on the road — alone."

He was looking straight ahead, and the slight pause before that last word made it emphatic. Slightly nettled, I asked, "Then why are you taking me on this trip?"

He chuckled and turned to me, his eyes laughing. "You know, that's something I haven't stopped to ask myself. But tell me — are you glad you're here?"

I assured him I was, and that seemed to settle the matter.

"I bought my first car in 1920 chiefly for travel in the South. You haven't experienced Jim Crow cars yet, have you?" When I shook my head, he continued, "Avoid them if you can. Train travel throughout the South is uncomfortable and uncertain at its best; the cars in which we are forced to ride are intolerable. In addition to the fact that they are always dirty, and poor white — drunk, filthy and obnoxious — may ride in the Jim Crow car, while no Negro — no matter how respectable he or she may be — can ride anywhere else."

He was silent a few moments. Then he shrugged away unpleasant thoughts and began telling me about the Atlanta University Conferences and the study centers he was setting up in each Southern state.

After a bit about what they were doing, he continued. "You see, my work demands that I travel a great deal. I frequently have to get into very remote places."

"You mean," I asked, "that you drive yourself all over the South — travelling alone? Isn't that dangerous?"

He laughed. "Well," he admitted, "I have been in a number of tight places — but, as you see, I managed to extricate myself." I thought about those possible "tight places," but he was continuing. "You must understand that I try to avoid trouble. For instance, I never appraoch either a garage or an eating place on the road. Therefore, I never ask for any kind of service. Before leaving Atlanta my excellent mechanic checks every part of the car; I always carry spare parts, and I have been taught the fundamentals of minor repairs."

"You can repair your car?" I asked in amazement.

"My dear young lady, in the trunk is a pair of overalls and heavy gloves. I can get out and get under this car whenever the necessity arises. I have done so more than once."

I was speechless, vainly trying to conjure up the picture of Dr. Du Bois, in overalls, crawling under his car!

The expression on my face amused him, and he continued to reassure me. "I keep off the roads at night, always managing to reach a friend's house in time for dinner. And the next morning I take along a lunch; when hunger assails me I pull off to the side of the road and eat — which is exactly what we're going to do before long."

An hour or so later we were sitting under a big tree in the curve of the road, consuming sandwiches, boiled eggs and apple pie. This was washed down with more of his hot coffee poured from a thermos bottle. The coffee was already sweetened and creamed and ordinarily would have been too rich for my taste, but it was just right for our picnic. When we had finished off everything he leaned against the trunk of the tree, smoked a cigarette and told me something of the struggle for bare existence waged by the blacks and whites whose shacks we could see as we drove along the road.

"Some of those people do own a plot of poor land, but they do not have the means or knowledge to improve and cultivate it. Most of them are sharecroppers who will never have anything or get ahead. In the land of plenty their children die of malnutrition." He sighed. "The South needs a total economic reshaping, an economic revolution." He crushed out the stub of his cigarette and stood up. "Everybody knows this — but if you say it you are called a Bolshevik!"

We cleared away all traces of our lunch and climbed into the car. As it rolled at a leisurely pace through the afternoon, he touched on many topics which he knew would interest me. He knew that my father, after retiring, was pastor of a small church in Indiana, and he asked about his health.

"He's not so well," I said, "but he wanted to continue working in the field."

"He's a valiant soldier," was Du Bois' comment.

He did not probe, but I found myself giving him my confidence. Concerning my little sons, I told him, "I have them both in the town of Oberlin, boarding with a good woman who sees that they get all of the advantages of Oberlin's

Together We Struggle, Together We Win

By SHIRLEY GRAHAM DUBOIS

Once more I have returned from the vast, bountiful cradle of black peoples; from the land of our forefathers; the land of sunshine and wide, deep rivers, a land of fertile plains and rich mineral deposits — a land of peoples in motion.

I am glad glad I can be here this evening attending this beautiful birthday party — an evening when we come together to extend Happy Birthday Greetings to THE BLACK SCHOLAR, to its founding Publisher, its editors and all those members of the staff which for five years have labored so valiantly, so unselfishly, so tirelessly to produce this excellent magazine.

I am deeply moved that you have commemorated my husband by naming THE BLACK SCHOLAR's Essay Awards after him and I do sincerely congratulate the three young scholars who are the award winners this year.

Five years ago I welcomes THE BLACK SCHOLAR from Egypt, as did Presidents Sekou Toure from Guinea, Julius Nyerere from Tanzania and black scholars, activists, politicians, religious leaders and teachers in the Americas.

For, however far apart we were geographically, however widely divergent might have been our political or economic views, our ideologies, methods or beliefs — we all had one common goal: the liberation of black folk in a world free from aggression, exploitation, neo-colonialism, injustice and fear.

THE BLACK SCHOLAR invited all of us with this common goal to contribute to its pages — to assist in building a forum of discussion, to debate issues and present ways of solving problems to present results of our research, to push back narrow and crippling boundaries of ignorance, to broaden and make supple our minds.

For those who conceived THE BLACK SCHOLAR sought Truth — and they knew that Knowledge is Power. An American economist, whose job it is to scan all English-language publications in America and in Europe told me last fall in China: "The articles published in THE BLACK SCHOLAR on the economic dilemma facing the West are the best in the lot."

THE BLACK SCHOLAR is welcomed in universities because students see it as "on the mark"; it furnishes pithy material for debates and opens up prospectives for the future. In 1970, on my return to the United States after ten years absence, I was surprised by the packed auditorium at one of the country's largest universities when so many students turned out to hear me speak. At a social gathering afterwards I commented on this and was told:

"Your Black Scholar articles on 'Egypt being Africa' caused quite a stir on this campus. Students and faculty argued and wrote on it offering evidence for and against that thesis. When it was announced that the author of those articles was going to speak here all of us wanted to hear how you would answer questions on that controversial idea!"

Actually, five years is a very short time. But the past five years have been an exceedingly important period in the struggle. The 1960's had seen much movement in the United States: Civil Rights campaigns were vigorously, often dramatically carried on; peace demonstrators marched on Washington by the thousands; demonstrating students, black and white, were clubbed and kicked by police from Columbia University in New York and University of Massachusetts in New England, across the country to the university campuses in California; students were killed at Kent College in Ohio and police in New York City, Chicago, San Francisco and Los Angeles went on a rampage of killing blacks!

Then came the 1970's and Richard Nixon was reelected to the White House by the biggest majority ever seen in this country. Only one, small state — Massachusetts — did not give him its votes! The then Governor of New York, NElson Rockefeller was absolved from all blame for the Attica Massacre and Henry Kissinger accepted the Nobel Peace Prize for having brought peace in Vietnam!

By this time folks in Europe, Africa, the Middle East and Asia were asking "What in God's name has happened to the people of the United States?" Then came Watergate — and to many, Watergate answered and explained everything that did or did not happen here.

But readers of THE BLACK SCHOLAR know that Watergate does not explain everything — explanations are not that simple. Times have changed — the sun is setting on economic empires; world imperialism is threatened because the balance of power is shifting and those who for so long have dominated the world are fighting back — subtlely, shrewdly — using old and well-tried methods — but using them in new ways. For now they know that if they do not "divide," they are lost!

When I spoke to you several years ago I pointed our a monumental mistake we had made in Africa: our best leaders had talked too much. I referred to the Founding Convention of the Organization of African Unity, held in Addis Ababa in May, 1963, of the introduction there of President Kwame Nkrumah's book Africa Must Unite; I told how the Heads of State announced from that rostrum

Zaire and the West

Rudolph Jones
(Chaka Amin)

Zaire, located in the Center of Africa, is bubbling with political activity, reminiscent of the 1960's when Patrice Lumumba was overthrown by Western Imperialist Interest.

At the time of the Coup d'etat the name of the country was the Congo. The country was just emerging from the yoke of colonial domination and exploitation enforced on the people of the Congo by the Belgiums. The name of the country has since been changed from the African name Congo, to the Portuguese name Zaire, by the country's present President, who also changed his name to Mobuto Sese Seko.

In 1966 President Mobuto came to power, in a Coup d'etat. Moise Tshombe and his Katagans forces were defeated in their attempts to secede the mineral rich Kataga province from Zaire proper. The 6,000 Katagans escaped the angola hoping to return to toppe the Mobutu regime.

Mr. Mobutu has reigned over Zaire for twelve years, and has managed to survive various attempts calculated to topple his government. Various sources however have maintained that this is the most serious of the threats.

One of the critical factors in this present threat is that the country is in a very serious economical crisis and that the Katagans who Mobutu's forces defeated and that in 1966 has since been beat in battle are well armed and well developed: The estimation is that the Katagans can easily defeat the Zairians army who are ill fed, ill equipped and ill developed. During his years in office, Mobutu has been on a reckless spending and borrowing spane. He has plunged the country into a staggering 3 billion foreign debt. Reliable sources maintain that most of the money was spent on building state mansions and opening Swiss accounts for Mobutu and his cohorts, instead of plugging the money into industry projects that are necessary if Zaire is to develop its vast mineral deposits and extricate its people out of the misery of poverty.

The economy of Zaire is in such bad state that in January 1976 an international consortium suspended work on the Tenke-Fungurume copper project in Katanga province where the estimated cost has risen from an initial $600 million when work began in 1974 to about $950 million.

The investors — American, British, French and Japanese — froze the project when Banks refused loans as a result of Zaires economic crisis and proven inability to repay loans.

The outcome of the Angolan civil war brought Zaire even closer to the brink of disaster. Mobuto supported CIA trained the equipped National Front Holden Roberto and found himself strangled by the outcome of the war.

The flow of Zaires export and imports through Angolan territory was restricted. This aggrevated the already serious economic crisis.

In March of 1976 Mobuto met with Angola's President Agostino Neto in Brazzaville to reconcile their differences. Mobuto wanted Neto to help restrain the Katagans from invading Zaire and also to ease the country's restricted access to the oceans. Mobuto on his part would banish Roberto's National Front from operating in Zaire. After the meeting the two leaders "clasped hand, smiled and signed a declaration affirming their desire for normal relations". One of Mobuto's aides remarked at the end of the meeting that "Westerners have a lot to learn from us about reconciliation". He stated that Mobuto's minister of Information for Antione Gizenga, Mobuto's worst enemy. The head of the police once led a rebellion against Mobuto.

The reconciliation between Mobuto and Neto initially appeared to be working until late February when tensions again began to rise. Angola increased its attack on Zaire for aiding a reassembled National Front in attacking Angolan villages along the Zairian border.

On March 8th a well trained, well developed and well armed force of former Katagan soldiers invaded Zaire's Katagan's province from Angola. Since then they have captured ½ of the province and including the Zairians command town of Mutshatsha and are advancing to the copper center of Kolwezi.

The United States, Belgium and France have been rushing in military aid to the Mobuto regime. Some analysts have observed that this aid probably will be to no avail because the Zairian army has been retreating and the people are welcoming the Katagans with open arms.

The present conflict in Zaire is causing headaches for the U.S. and Western Europe reminiscent of Vietnam. U.S. interest in Zaire is extensive, American investments and loans have exceeded $2 billion. The most important of these are investments by big U.S. banks and industrial corporations. The U.S. bank with interest in Zaire are Citybank of New York, Morgan Guaranty, Manufacturers Hanover Trust, The Bank of America, EQUIBANK of Pittsburgh and Continental Illinois Bank of Chicago. Among the Industrial Corporations are General Motors, Goodyear Tire and Rubber, Continental Hotels, and three big oil companies — Standard Oil of Indiana, Mobil and Texaco.

There is no question that these banks and industrial corporations are interested in securing their investments. This might call for a clandestine military operations.

Some political analysists of the United States Foreign policy argued that the U.S. capital flow is always followed by the U.S. military to protect these investments. In other words wherever there is a sizable amount of U.S. capital in a particular country, there is either an American military base in the country or there is a sizable military assistance program.

In June 1976 former Sec. of Defense Brumsfeld journeyed to Kenya and Zaire. The aim of the visit was discussion of military aid to the two pro-western African nations. Bernard Weinraub writing in the New York Times on June 19, 1976, states that prior to the Brumsfeld visit, U.S. military assistance to Zaire was in the form of Communication and Transportation equipment, small arms and artillery, New assistance post — Brumsfelds visit will enclose more "sophisticated weapons to meet what diplomats and Zairians term the psychological uncertainty and potential threat of border instability along the Angolan Frontier."

President Carter has described Mobuto as a close friend of the United States. Implying that the United States will defend her friends when they are being attacked. America's friends in Africa are dwindling because of this country's support of Portuguese colonialism in Angola, Mozambique and her support of apartheid regimes in South Africa, Nambia and Zimbabwe.

DuBois Community Award

Nominations forms may be picked up at the CCEBS office. The last day for nominations will be Friday, April 15, 1977. Voting will be held in the lobby of New Africa House on Tuesday, April 19, 1977.

This will be awarded to the CCEBS student who has made the greatest community service contribution to the University of Massachusetts Third World Community.

Education And Race

By Dr. Wilfred Cartey

Education and Race is a big topic it is very important in this country in that it can account for the election of Presidents or the Non-election of Presidents.

Some years ago I remember George Wallace standing in front of the door of a University trying to keep out a Black Student from entering. If we think of that it is a very odd thing to do, to stand and say you give your life to prevent a man from going into a room to hear words that he should be hearing all the time.

I think that this is a model that Race and Education are linked together in that if you Educate a man then you cannot enslave him, and if slavery means than Race is Enslaved. To educate a race means that you cannot enslave it and cannot continue to think that a race is inferior and you are superior.

Education in this country has been used to deny Blacks entry into the basic environment in this country I am not saying that the environment is good for Blacks or bad but any education is meant to feed a person and give him or her the necessary tools to enter into that environment to live with it and benefit from it's growth, adding to it and receiving from it and any education that does not do that is a waste of time. The only reason which anyone should get an education is to live to create to help to add to the environment and to support it. But Blacks have been left out of the environment, that interaction that intersecting of living in that environment of just breathing lifes vibrations Blacks have been excluded from that or if they have not been excluded they have been included only when violent actions have taken place, court cases. The process is a to and fro movement all the time of exclusion and inclusion, inclusion at the price of violence.

The period in which we are in now is again a period of exclusion which is now called reverse discrimination following a period of inverse inclusion.

Africans were snatched out of their environment and placed into a different environment and no education was replaced no education meaning none, except to try to christianize, was to deny the basic human rights. Clearly then that has been the pattern of the relationship between Education and Race the denial of basic rights to Blacks in this country and in Africa and in other countries during colonial times again an attempt of deny the basic rights of people in their own country. So the play between Race and Education is a very intrinsic play. The movement of Blacks in This Country towards education has been a movement to reach back to Africa to the tradition sense of things either well or badly not having known these traditions very well and at the same time to attempt to integrate into the society, a word which we know so well.

The Christianization of Blacks in this Country was not by accident The Christianization was a way to educate into exceptance of an animal status. The Christianization of Blacks was to martyr them without giving them the validity of being martyred and the process away from that has been a process of Education and Race. To integrate into the society is to lose ones self, as you go into something else you become no one and you will become integral by going into another process which is not of yours. The shutting out of Blacks from the societal and environmental and the attempt of Blacks to enter into Life here even while trying to reach back to Africa has become that Ambiguous Ambivalence search for many Blacks the basic search for ones self and the basic holding on of self.

DOWN WITH APARTHEI REVOLUTIONARY STUDENT

By MIGUEL RIVERA

For as long as I can remember, the student leadership and the student body have always tried hard to relate the struggle in the universities with world issues. There is no way to make sure that there is a commonality of interests in everyday praxis; but, international issues make us feel that we belong to the big family of human beings.

International issues make us exercise the principle of international proletarianism. After all, the struggle, as well as the enemy, is one and the same. We also realize that we are not alone when our actions respond to some sort of world issue. World solidarity is healthful.

And, if international issues are taken down to communities then the struggle gets to many more hearts and minds. The more people there are atuned to what is going on, the better. The revolution is a matter of quantity and quality, together in a dialectical unity that leaves no space for separation. The revolution is impossible if the masses are not into it.

In taking the struggle to communities, individuals grow. They learn from the people. They also get a chance to go over an educational process which determines their effectiveness as agents of change as well as changing agents.

It is within this context that the protest we held some days ago needs to be analyzed. There is no doubt as to the validity of the issue: U-Mass should get out of South Africa. U-Mass is already indirectly responsible for the sad incidents that occur there.

We have spoken to a small number of students about the issue. They do not see the relationship between the University and the racist regime of South Africa. Therefore, a little more information concerning the whole issue should be disseminated.

We also believe the call for the protest must be taken to individuals on a more personal level. The value of talking to as many people as possible on a one-to-one basis is incredible. But, it takes time. An evaluation is needed concerning what is the top priority now. If it is time, then there is no sense in trying to reach as many people as we can in a more personal way.

On the other hand if the priority is to press the University to get out of South Africa, then it seems

by: Vukani Magubane

On Saturday night, the UMass community was treated to a unique fashion show, disco and cabaret. With disco sounds providing the background music, the models did their "thing" while wearing some of the latest fashions from the Weathevane Beau Britches, On Stage and the Wearhouse. The show featured the latest in women and men's wear.

The show was a Mac-Roc Disco & Company production. The music was produced by Kirk A. Williams, Joseph Andrews, and Isaiah E. Bradshaw. The fashion co-ordinators for the show were Brenda Bellizeare and Kim Hill. For the audience, not only were the clothes breath-taking but the music allowed them to get involved with finger snapping and hand clapping.

The evening was divided into two parts. The first half of the evening featured the latest in sportswear and daytime fashions. The models "strutted" down the runway in swim-wear, gaucho suits, 3 piece-pants suits and other clothes worn by the man or woman who take pride in their appearance. The second half of the show was devoted to the evening look. Clothes for that "special" evening when you want to look your very best.

To top the evening off, eveyone participated in an informal dinner and disco dancing. The whole event was a community event enabling everyone to get together for a good time.

Professor Hattie Fox

On Tuesday, April 12, the Comparative Racism Program of Northeast-Sylvan and Orchard Hill-Central areas will host Professor Hattie Fox who will give a lecture: "Racism in History", and a percussion and audiovisual workshop at Van Meter, at 7:30 p.m.

Professor Fox, who is a psychologist and historian, among other things, was educated at San Diego and UCLA. She is founder of the Neo Presearch Energy Foundation based in the South Bronx whose projects include a multidisciplinary, multi-aesthetical approach to education; a presearch of the old assumptions about education and history; a search for an alternative approach to the mobilization of energy resources; introducing to neo-education, traditional ways of body and mind healing, sucha as African medicine.

Professor Fox is a brilliant percussionist and has the unusual ability to play six or more timbalis together. She has performed with Don Cherry and Ornette Coleman. She has recorded with Archie Shepp. She has her own female jazz group.

To meet Hattie Fox or Bunchy, her sobriquet, is to come face to face with genius, with a nonlinear human being who has integrated the arts into a composite view of life, into a composite person who is an inseperable part of the socio-political economy.

Aspiring To Liberate

The Asian American Conference sponsored by theAsian American Student Association was April 8 and 9. It was entitled, "Aspiring to Liberate, the Engagement of Personal Action to Collective Struggle." As the title suggests, we are still struggling against an oppressive society to redefine our identity, to fight racism and sexism, and to get in touch with the unity and bond between Asian Americans and the rest of the third world.

Bob Suzuki

Professor Bob Suzuki, the only individual to teach an Asian American course in five college area in the last 150 years, was the first speaker. He explained the distortion of truth in history because of an imperialistic western perspective on the part of the United States. Relating the history of oppression and racism that has plagued the Asian American, he states, "The struggle started when the first Asian stepped foot on this land".

The next event was the coffeehouse. The arts are important avenues for creative cultural expression. During the coffeehouse poetry was read, skits portraying how asian Americans are stereotyped were performed, and music was created by the "Warriors of the Rainbow" (Nobuko Miyamoto and Bennie Yee). Their songs were lyrics of love; love for all oppressed people and appreciation for our struggle. Nobuko's passion inspired the audience to believe in our cause and hope for unity and strength in our struggle.

The Japanese Americans who were forced into concentration camps durin World War II, the importing of Chinese workers as scabs in the late 1800's, and the lynching of Asians without provocation by racist whites were examples of the oppressive racist atmosphere prevalent in the United states historically.

An important question he raised was that since this country was built on the backs of it's immigrant workers and our forefathers sweated as hard as anyone else, why are we the oppressed ones?

This historical expioitation was well documented in a film entitled, "From Spikes to Spindles" directed by Christine Choy. It presented the unification of the Chinese people in New York Chinatown over discrimination in job hiring, the beating of a brother, Peter Yew, by a policeman, and many other issues. I think the point of the film was that Asian Americans will not take this shit anymore, they are getting mad and they will fight and win.

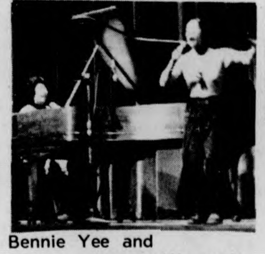
After years of socialization and indoctrination to assimilation to the melting pot, we think of the situation as our problem rather than one of society. Warren Furutani, a community worker from Los Angeles was the second speaker, states "that we are continually having to go through changes because society has not been accepting of who we are and our different ways." Instead we must start making those changes to have a truthful representation of the Asian American experience and to be the makers of our destiny.

Following his speech, the workshops were held. It was divided into two sections. In the first one, "the Politics of Interpersonal relations", we tried to analyze how being an Asian American influence our interpersonal relations, and how to strengthen the Asian American movement by improving our relations among ourselves and other third world members.

The second set of workshops were entitled, "The Politics of Community Involvement", in which we asked ourselves how we can move from rhetoric to action in the community. We felt these community responsibilities can be fulfilled in community organizing, community service, professionalism, University action, and in research.

The male-female workshop drew the largest crowd. It dealt with breaking out of stereotypes of being Asian American male or female (Hop Sing or Suzie Wong). In order to reach "human liberation", we should not only criticize others who only see us through te stereotypes, but also create support groups.

For many of us, it touched the innermost part of our being. It really linked strangers and made them friends. Paul Ng said, "The workshop forced me to reflect upon how my attitudes were developed and investigate how they were reinforced by society".



Bennie Yee and Joanne Miyamoto,

For this writer, it was two days I will never forget. The high I feel is indescribable; it created support for me as a person, support for what I believe in, and support that the problems can be overcome when we unite. The third world will no longer be the oppressed minority, no longer will we be fighting with each other for the same health care, the same housing, or the same human services. We must unite to demand what is ours and instead of being a minority, we collectively will be the majority.

If you follow me then you see that from slavery to freedom there is a movement of Blacks into selfdom and into their own education, so that when we look at people like Booker T. Washington and Dr. W.E.B. DuBois we see a confrontation of integrate nonintegrate except reject various searches into possibilities of the technical nontechnical approach into the society. The validation process in terms of Education and Race has effected Blacks and that comes back from that whole enslavement self and that whole integrating into something.

Built into the Educational process of this country still is that process that started with Slavery that of negating the traditions and negating the presence and negating the human qualities of Blacks. This meant turning Blacks heads around to value themselves as trying to be white. So linked to Education and Race is a whole psychological transformation.

Education has been made into a dislocated process in the last five hundred years, and in this country here the same process took place.

Education can only come to Blacks when they know themselves when they believe in themselves when they don't have to grasp outside to try to validate ourselves when we can work with out hands if we have to when we can work with our heads if we have to, that combinations of essences we have to bring together. Education is the most important thing for Blacks we have to know technology we have to know chemistry, biology and we must retain soul, the humanistic and technological ends.

★ Egypt is Africa

By SHIRLEY GRAHAM DUBOIS

William Strickland talks with Mrs. Du Bois

Let us begin with the observation that the Greek word from which our word "history" is derived originally meant research or investigation. Stemming from this, we declare with certainty that Herodotus, the Greek, must be considered a true historian. He was an intrepid and inquisitive traveler and investigator. His research carried him into places hitherto unknown to the peoples of the Mediterranean, his observations went far below the surface, his conclusions were based on facts.

Herodotus' findings frequently ran counter to the views of his peers in Greek ruling circles. Though having no interest in politics, he was criticized for his "unorthodox" political ideas. Were he going out from Athens today, his writings would undoubtedly be censored, and he, perhaps, jailed.

It is to this Greek historian that we turn for our earliest description of Egypt. Since the deciphering of the Rosetta Stone in 1822, papyrus, parchment and funereal inscriptions account for Egvpt as far back as the first Pharaohs, but these records usually must be gazed at in glass cases in museums. Fortunately, however, much of the early history of Egypt is sculptured in monuments of stone and carved and painted on walls which the sands and dry air of Egypt have preserved. One must come to the Valley of the Nile to see them; they are well worth the journey.

It was about 300 B.C. that Herodotus traveled from one end of the Nile Valley to the other. And, having spent some time with the priests and scribes of Thebes (the original Thebes in upper Egypt), who instructed him on the exploits of the first three hundred rulers of Egypt, he crossed the Red Sea and followed in the footsteps of one Sesostris, a Pharoah who in those dim and ancient days, became master of Scythia and Thrace and left a colony called Colchis on the bank of the river Phasis. Of this colony Herodotus writes:

> There is no doubt that the Colchians are an Egyptian race. I made inquiries. My own conjecture was founded, first, on the fact that they are black skinned and have woolly hair, which certainly amounts to but little, since several other nations are so, too; but further and more especially, on the circumstances that the Colchians, the Egyptians and the Ethiopians, are the only nations who have practiced circumcism from the earliest times.

I quote from Herodotus' book on the First Peloponnesian War, which be begins with these words:

> These are the researches of Herodotus of Halicarnassus, which he publishes in the hope of thereby preserving from decay the remembrance of what men have done, and of preventing the great and wonderful actions of the Greeks and the Barbarians from losing their due meed of glory.

Follows an account of the Phoenicians who "formerly dwelt on the shores of the Red Sea...freighting their vessels with the warea of Egypt and Assyria." Then:

> Concerning Egypt itself, i shall extend my remarks to a great length, because there is no country that possesses so many wonders nor any that has such a number of works which defy description. Not only is the climate different from that of the rest of the world, and the rivers unlike any other rivers, but the people also, in most of their manners and customs, exactly reverse the common practice of mankind. The women attend the market and trade, while the men sit at home at the loom....Women carry burdens on their shoulders, while men carry them on their heads....
> When they write or calculate, instead of going like the Greeks from left to right, they move their hand from right to left. They have two different kinds of writing, — one sacred, the other common. They are religious to excess far beyond any other race of men....They drink out of brazen cups which they scour every day. They wear linen garments, which they are careful to have freshly washed. They practice circumsicm for the sake of cleanliness, consi-ering it better to be cleanly than comely....

Religious ceremonies came to Greece from Egypt....Almost all the names of the gods came into Greece from Egypt.

Herodotus discusses these religious ceremonies at length and gives one of the traditional beliefs:

> Two black doves flew from Thebes (Egypt) — one to Libya and one to the Oracles of Zenus in Greece....By calling the doves black, the Dodomaens indicated that the woman was Egyptian.

It was Herodotus who called Egypt "the gift of the Nile." Rivers and streams have always been the highways of primitive man; flowing water cuts through the thick forests, finds it way through caverns and over rocks. Mammals followed the course of the river by whatever means could be devised.

Early twentieth century German explorers discovered in East Africa evidences that man existed there as long ago as 600,000 years.

Evidently these prehistoric peoples found the Valley of the Nile a good place. Certainly, the soil was fertile and there is no doubt that they regarded the Nile as a lifegiving force. But it quickly became evident that they must protect themselves from the hazards of floods, while at the same time taking full advantage of the rich soil which the floods brought. There was neither time nor need for the first settlers to fight among themselves. Thus, from the beginning their manners and customs were based on the demands and the disciplines exacted by the river. Had the Nile been more ferocious, it might have crippled the civilization emerging on its banks. Had it been a mild, placid stream, it might have lulled the people into a contented torpor. As it was, the river was the ideal disciplinarian — neither too stern nor too lenient.

Here we must point out that the original designation "Egypt" included the entire Valley of the Nile — whether it was in present-day Egypt, the Sudan, Nubia or Ethiopia ("burnt-skinned"). And the civilization which emerged in Egy0t must be understood as rising from the entire Valley of the Nile.

Adolf Erman (Handbook on Egypt, the Berlin Imperial Museum) declares:

> From time immemorial, the narrow valley of the Lower Nile was inhabited by peoples of the African race, who pastured their cattle on the marshes of the delta and grew their corn in the cultivated land of the upper country, and in consequence of their peaceful pursuits attained earlier than other nations to an advanced stage of civilization.

Thus, while western historians and philosophers have been trying to explain away Egypt and all it stands for through some mysterious Aryan strain, mingled with Semitic and Asian, travelers, archaeologists and geographers frankly recognized that Egypt is African. Geographers saw the Nile river from its two sources, one in Ethiopia and one in Uganda, as the mighty artery carrying its stream of rich blood, black with fertile soil and hot passions to Egypt from the interior of Africa, after passing through two thousand miles of tropical forests and mountains. The art of Egypt draws from this river, speaks of the forces of nature, makes hymns to its waters; depicts man calling on the river for succor and in praise. At the gateway to the Sudan, on the banks of the Nile, a splendid mountain is turned into a temple and decorated with hamitic imagination and virility. Once the Aswan Dam is completed, not a drop of water from Lake Tana, at one source, or Lake Victoria, the other, will reach Resetta or Darmietta, where the sea pushes back into the river. The Nile waters, entirely canalized, redistributed, employed, passed through turbines and filtered through dams, will be absorbed into Sudanese and Egyptian soil. Thus, Egypt definitely turns her back on the Mediterranean and Europe, folding in on her river and Africa.

While few people have read Herodotus, millions probably first came across the word "Egypt" in the Bible. I quote from the Gospel of Matthew, Chapter II:

> And the angel of the Lord appeared to Joseph in a dream, saying, Arise, take the young child and his mother, and flee into Egypt, and be thou there until I bring thee word — for Herod will seek the young child to destroy him.
> When he arose, he took the young child and his mother by night and departed into Egypt.
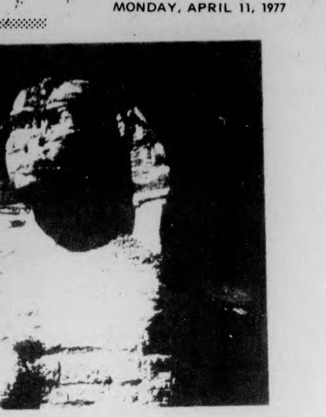
> And was there until the death of Herod: that it might be fulfilled which was spoken of the Lord by the prophet, saying, Out of Egypt have I called my son.

Perhaps these three verses give fundamental and cogent reasons why the modern white Christian world has so persistently and resolutely ignored and even denied that Egypt is Africa. Perhaps it was too much for them to acknowledge that their Christ had to be taken to Egypt to escape death — that in this part of Africa that he was called forth to save the world!



THE BLACK SCHOLAR SEPTEMBER 1970

There was no hiding the fact that from the Valley of the Nile man first lifted his eyes to the stars and made calculatons on them — first grasped the perfection of the triangle and constructed his pyramids on its principle, that in Egypt science and art were born, and in Egypt death was but a door to eternal life. No one could dispute records which have come down from antiquity. And so they placed Egypt in some dim and hazy sphere, vaguely connected with white Europe, obscurely outlined. Never, during my rather extensive schooling in the United States, was Egypt related to anything black or any part of Africa.

Now that black students have forced colleges and universities in America to include black studies in their curricula, those who would may become familiar with the map of Africa and see that Egypt is definitely within the clearly defined boundaries of this largest of continents. But with this established, various "authorities on Africa" write at length about "Africa, South of the Sahara," "Africa, North of the Sahara," of "Black Africa" and "Arab Africa," as if there are long dividing and confining walls stretching in every direction. I must tell you that there are black peoples all over Africa — there are Islamic peoples, sometimes Arabs, but more often not — all over Africa; and reluctantly, I must add — there are white people all over Africa.

I had not read Herodotus when I first saw Egypt in December, 1958. From Athens I flew to Cairo, across the Mediterranean not in a huge jet plane, which is the only means of air travel today (jets flying so fast and so high that passengers see nothing but sky and clouds, except in the few minutes of ascent and descent — and then what one sees in an airport!) In 1958, my Greek plane flew low enought for me to see the choppy waters of the Mediterranean tossing an occasional ship — like a child's toy.

I pressed close to the window to catch my first sight of Africa. It was late afternoon and the sun was throwing long rays across the water when I saw it — outlined by a rim of white foam — waves dashing against that old and indestructible shore.

In a few minutes the stewardess was pointing out the city of Alexandria curling around its bay and, on the other side, the ruins of old Alexandria, sacked hundreds of years ago in a succession of wars. Then we were over the delta and could plainly see the spread-out fingers of the Nile, which from time immemorable, held in its palm rich famlands — once designated the

Black Organizers Conference

The Amherst Chapter of the NSBA (National Black Student Association) and the African American Student Society at the University of Mass. is sponsoring a Black Organizers Conference, April 15, 16 and 17th, 1977.

The purpose of the conference is to draw together some of the most active organizers who have survived the 1960's and early 1970's to make an analysis of what is the present condition of black people today and what should be the future directions of the black liberation struggle. Invited guests participants are:

Miss Ella Baker, co-worker of the late Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. and SNCC (Student Non-violent Coordinating Committee) adviser.

Joe Walker, Chairman of the African People's Socialist Party based in Florida and Virginia.

Rev. Charles Koen, Chairman of the National United Front of Cairo, Ill., and SNCC activist.

Walter Collins, anti war-prison activist representative of the National Gary Taylor Defense Committee, New Orleans, Louisiana.

General Gordon Baker, Founder of DRUM and League of Revolutionary Black Workers (LRBW).

Robert Williams, ex-president of the RNA Republic of New Africa.

PROPOSED SCHEDULE FOR THE CONFERENCE:

Friday, April 15: Registration 7 p.m. — 9 p.m. Welcoming Remarks. Opening Address: "The Present Condition of Black People in the United States." — Bill Strickland, Prof. UMass: Question and Answer Period.

Saturday, April 16 — 10 p.m. Orientation: Brief Remarks. Workshops: 1. The International Aspects of Third World Struggles in U. S. — Tran VanDinh-Workshop leader. 2. Strategy & Tactics of Mass Mobilization — Walter Collins-Charles Koen. 3. Political Economy and Black Liberation — Bill Strickland-Lloyd Hogan. 4. The Role of Black Workers in the Liberation Struggle — Gen. Gordon Baker.

12 noon — Lunch.

2 p.m. to 5 p.m. Workshops continue.

5 p.m. to 7 p.m. Workshops. 1. Movement Building — Charles Koen-Walter Collins. 2. The Role of Black Workers in the Liberation Struggle — Gen. Baker-Lloyd Hogan. 3. Students and the Politics of Liberation — Joe Waller-Akbor Muhammad Ahmad-Rob Williams.

9 p.m. Presentations — The Significance of SCLC and SNCC to the Black Liberation Struggle — Miss Ella Baker. Mass Organizing — Walter Collins. New Direction of the Black Liberation Struggle — Robert F. Williams.

Saturday Evening: Workshop reports and collective discussion with Conference Panel.

Sunday, April 17th — 11 a.m. Workshops continue. Those workshops conference participants want continued.

1 p.m. Collective Discussion on Conference Objectives and follow-up.

Summation.

The purpose of this conference is to draw together some of the most active organizers to make an anlysis of what is the present condition of black people today and what should be the future direction of the black liberation struggle.

Egypt Is Africa Con'T·

"Bread Basket of the Roman Empire." Suddenly, I saw a winding ribbon of gold! It was the Nile reflecting the last rays of Egypt's powerful sun. We followed the golden ribbon and gradually the green stretches on either side narrowed. I was straining to see into the gathering gloom beyond the still shining river when we landed at Cairo. I came out of the plane and stood motionless before a black sky dripping with crimson and gold — fading off into rose and green and purple. Never had I seen such a spectacular sunset.

I was one of a group taken to the Continental Hotel in the heart of the city. Everything about the place was big: wide corridors, big rooms with high ceilings, and big bathrooms. (This hotel has since been remodeled along more modern lines.) I awoke next morning to a sound I recognized as the call to prayer from some nearby minaret. When I threw back that shutters I found that my room overlooked an inner courtyard where vivid flowers and dwarf trees in huge tubs were already flooded with sunshine. Surrounding walls and irregular blocks of buildings seemed etched against a blue sky. I could not see the street, though I could hear the rumble of traffic. A telephone call brought a portly, white-robed waiter with orange juice (fresh), coffee and hot croissants. His round, brown face was wreathed in smiles of welcome.

I had just left the ice and wintery blasts of Russia, so I hurried to get out into the warm, bright sunshine. In a short time I was down on the portico of the hotel. The street before me was wide, divided into two lanes by a strip of green shrubs and flowers. Across the way was what appeared to be a park rising in terraces, where winding walks disappeared among towering, old trees. Along the two lanes of the street, automobiles, trucks and buses crowded bicycles, small carts — heaped with farm products and pedestrians — darting in and out. I joined the throng on the sidewalk going towards the corner. There, miraculously, it seemed to me, one small, very straight, white-clad, belted traffic cop channeled allthe jumble of traffic safely on its way. As I stood there waiting for the signal to cross, my face must have reflected by delight. For I found myself being greeted with smiles and nods and soft words from these perfect strangers. And I responded cordially in kind because they did not seem like "strangers." For these people on the Cairo street were colored. Not all blacks — though there were plenty of blacks among them — but so far as complexions went, I might just as well have been walking along a street on the South Side, Chicago! Later in the day I would have seen some whites. But at this early hour, Europeans, Americans and remnants of past nobilities and feudalism, were not yet moving about. I was seeing a representative portion of the masses of Cairo; old and young, men and women, shopkeepers, clerks, market folks, students — all going about the business of the day. And I felt an instant kinship with them.

We do not here raise the issue as to where, on earth, Man, as we know him, first existed. After seeing the skull of the Peking Man, who the Chinese declare was the "first man;" after visiting excavations in Central China which uncovered human habitations built in some dim long ago age, being shown the weapons, tools and utensils these inhabitants used — I am convinced that claims for the "first man," as well as for the "first civilization" may always be clouded with uncertainty. But, because the advanced stages of civilization in China or even in Mesopotamia, had no effect on the dawn of civilization in Europe — we must trace Western civilization and learning from the Valley of the Nile, through Greece and Rome to Europe and to America.

Of what "stock" then were the ancient peoples who made the first contributions to Western civilization?

We are aware of how ridiculous, how unscientific, how unsocial it is to separate mankind categorically into blocks and to put racial tags on each grouping. The discovery of indigenous peoples with very dark skins near the North Pole and of indigenous peoples with very white skins on the equator upset many calculations of the anthropologists. But, since we live in a world where peoples of white skins insist on their superiority over peoples of dark skins, since these whites unite in aggression and attempts to dominate the world;

—where after annihilating Indian nations of North America, they now seem bent on wiping out the dark-skinned nations of Southeast Asia;

—where Great Britain explains her failure to prevent 220,000 of her colonists in East Africa from taking over the lands and lives of four million blacks by saying Englishmen cannot fight their "kith and kin";

—when only employ gestures are made against a handful of whites seizing and appropriating to themselves the rich lands and boundless wealth of the southern portion of Africa, while its millions of blacks remain little more than slaves;

—in a world which today activates the pronouncements of Adolph Hitler far more effectively than he ever did; in this world it is expedient to take the classifications which the "master people" themselves have made and to employ their own theories to expose distortions and lies — even as the guerrille fighter takes up the weapon dropped from the hands of the enemy and plunges it into his back!

Let us then examine the "race" of those peoples who first came into the Valley of the Niles: (a) the smaller numbers coming from the Arabian peninsula; (b) others coming from northern Africa; (c) the larger and apparently earliest, coming from the interior of the continent by way of the Nile.

(a) This group may be designated as "Semites" — defined in the Oxford Dictionary as: members of any race supposed to be descendants from Shem,son of Noah, including Hebrews, Armeneans, Phoenicians, Arabs and Assyrians. It must be remembered that the people of whom we speak here came long before the establishment of any of those empires.

Before naming the peoples from the interior and northern Africa as "Hamites," I checked three dictionaries.

Oxford's and Cassell's agree that a Hamite is a descendent of Ham, son of Noah; one belonging to the Hamitic stock, comprising the Egyptians and other African races.

But Webster's Dictionary defines a "Hamite" as being a descendant of Noah's second son; a Caucasian of the native stock of North Africa.

Astonished, I then looked up "Semite" in Webster's Dictionary and read: Semite — a member of the Caucasian race, now chiefly represented by the Jews and Arabs, but in ancient times including the Babylonians, Assyrians, Phoenicians, etc."

Thus — according to Webster — Caucasians comprised the bulk of the people who first came into the Valley of the Nile. And all peoples who produced any ancient civilization or built empires anywhere — were Caucasians!

(Of course, the Chinese do not exist.)

However, may I say that when, in the context of this paper I use the term "Hamite," I am not referring to Caucasians from North Africa or from anywhere else. I am referring to blacks.

Thousands of time the Nile River rose and fell and the settlers on its banks merged and multiplied. Additional people came, following old trails, and were absorbed into the settlements. And, as men achieved mastery over their environment, they struggled for dominance over each other — and the stronger became masters. With the first great Pharaonic period, seven thousands years ago, the sons of Ham had gained ascendency. They built the first capital, calling it Thebes, whose ruins may be visited today in upper Egypt. And this dominance of Hamites is recorded, for all to see, in the mighty monuments of Egypt.

A visit to the Valley of the Kings near that ancient capital, a tour of the museums of Cairo, five minutes' scrutiny of the face of the Sphinx — and you will know what the Pharaonic Egyptians looked like. Their sculptors, engravers, goldsmiths, painters and makers of pottery, were masters of the art of realism. And, in the larger than life stone portraints of the brilliant period when Egypt laid the cornerstones for science, art, engineering and architecture — in those portraits you will see, almost without exception, the features of men and women, who in our world today, are designated as Negroes or blacks.

Angela Davis, Master of Ceremonies Carlton Goodlett and Mrs. Du Bois at the Hyatt Regency

In Western art, a statue always has a certain narrative element, telling or depicting a definite moment in the life of the model as the sculptor conceives it. The statue fixes an attitude in passing, a gesture, or a state in facial expression. For the ancient Egyptians, a statue had quite a different meaning; it was the fulfillment of an attempt to find for the perishable body an imperishable presentment wherein the sould could be reincarnated — it was the material expression in statuary form of the hieroglypic symbol of the dead person. The most ancient statues were, therefore, images — as exact as could be made.

Look up at the mammoth statue of Rameses II, which stands in the center of a Cairo square which bears his name, and in the bright sunlight you will easily recognize his features as belonging to a kinsman! Among the finest pieces of Old Kingdom sculpture found in the Cairo Museum is a superb statue of a seated scribe. Now, the calling of a scribe was regarded as the noblest of all callings and in this broad, lifted face with its large eyes and flaring nostrils one senses a pride, almost arrogance, softened by the full, slightly curved lips. Nearby is the best preserved wooden statue from the 4th Dynasty. It is the famous "Sheik el Balad" (the mayor of the village). This man is standing, one foot advanced, holding a long staff in his hand. The features are unmistakable.

Man's religion is the core of his being. And the religious beliefs and observances of Egypt ran parallel in form and expression to the early religions of deepest Africa. All were based on man's dependence on and, therefore, his submission to, nature. Just as the Congo, Niger and Volta rivers and their creatures were venerated and placated in West Africa, so in Egypt the Nile was worshiped and, in times of distress, human sacrifices were made to its crocodiles. Throughout Africa, certain animals were worshiped either as gods, or as being the abode or reincarnation of a god. Throughout the continent, life after death was a fundamental concept — taking different forms, it is true — but nowhere was a man's death looked upon as his final end. And everywhere, powerful cults of priesthood developed. In Egypt, it was frequently the priests who made and removed the Pharaohs.

In the ancient kingdom of Ghana, in West Africa, the king was revealed as an incarnation of the god of his clan, worshiped in the Falcon. In ancient Egypt the Falcon was worshiped sometimes as Osiris — the god of resurrection — and sometimes as Horus, the Protector. Today in West Africa the royal symbols of the Aken peoples are: a crouching Falcon, representing the Mother Goddess, and the full upright Falcon, representing the Sun God.

One of the most delightful pieces in the Cairo Museum is that of the infant, Rameses II, squatting between the protective wings of a giant Falcon.

Today, whenever President Gamal Abdul Nasser appears before the National Assembly to address it and the nation, as he stands on the rostrum facing the assemblage and the battery of television cameras and radios which carry his words throughout the land and to the outside world — immediately behind and above him, on the wall, looms a massive Falcon, with outstretched wings. This is his symbol.

Egypt, during the ages of the Pharaohs, was a land of agricultural production, as well as the seat of arts, scieces and manufacturing. The existence of the canal connecting the Nile River with the Red Sea shows the importance attached to trade with the Indian seas. Ancient authorities testify to trade with the Indian peninsula and with China. There existed no openings toward the Mediterranean. The shores of that sea were, for the most part, inhabited by barbarous or semi-barbarous nations — and the peoples of Europe were still living in caves.

It was Alexander the Great who opened Egypt to the Mediterranean, though Egypt for him was only a step in his campaign against Persia. The Persians had defeated the Egyptian armies and, though they were unable to occupy any part of the land, they continually invaded and harassed it. When, therefore, Alexander put the Persians to flight, he was welcomed at Memphis, the second capital. There he made thank offerings to the gods of Egypt and the small port in the delta where his forces had landed was named in his honor.

The death of Alexander was the starting point of a conflict between his generals over the division of his empire. General Ptolemy based himself at Alexandria and, after a long and bitter struggle, drover all contenders away. In 305 B.C., Ptolemy proclaimed himself King of Egypt.

He absorbed, rather than conquered, the remaining Pharaonic dynasty, but although he called himself its secessor, Ptolemy knew that neither Thebes nor Memphis, traditional capitals, were suitable for the responsibilities of his new epoch. It was necessary that his capital overlook the Eastern Mediterranean. This coast had to be protected, and it was by way of the Mediterranean that new commercial ties would be established, It followed that the first Ptolemies made Alexandria the most beautiful capital of the ancient world. No other city could compare with it in splendor, wealth and culture. The best of Greek learning and art could be found in its magnificent museum and library. Foremost Greek scholars, including Aristotle, came to Egypt, learned and taught. And through the port of Alexandria came peoples from all the known world, bringing new blood streams of every variety into Egypt. Alexandria became a cosmopolitan city in every sense of the word.

Yet, it must be emphasized that the wealth-seekers, pleasure-seekers, European and Eastern foreigners who poured into Alexandria were concerned only with the city and the productive fields of the delta. As Alexandria became richer, it population swelled and the Ptolemaic festivities more elaborate, Egypt all along the Nile was ignored, except when additional tribute or slaves were needed to swell the coffers of Alexandria. The last Ptolemaic rulers were symbols of excess, corruption and tyranny. Scipio the African visited Egypt in 100 B.C., and was shocked by the debauchery and degeneration he witnessed in Alexandria.

So, in 31 B.C., Egypt fell before the expanding power of Rome. Its final phase was marked by the bloody conflict on the outskirts of Alexandria when Mark Anthony led the forces of Egypt's Cleopatra against the mighty Roman legions.

The last Ptolemaic rulers committed suicide. After the death of Cleopatra and Mark Anthony, the Emperior Augustus sent a prefect to rule from Alexandria. Egypt was considered the greatest prize of the new Roman Empire. And from the delta, food was sent out to feed the Roman legions as they continued their conquest of Africa and Asia Minor. But life for the Egyptians masses went on very much as it had been as long a men remembered — and the Nile continued to rise and fall in season. But the ancient glory of Egypt was gone; temples and palaces were left to the encroaching sands; the Sphinx and the smaller pyramids were buried in sand. Old Egypt was to slumber for a thousand years while its science, learning and art, taken by the Greeks, passed on to Rome and thence to the "barbarians" of Europe.

how they intended to unite Africa — and what it would mean to Africans when they took over their continent, with all its rich products.

These things were explicitly spelled out before the eyes and ears of everybody. Results, of course, were catastrophic! Coup after coup swept over the continent removing those leaders who would unite and who insisted that Africans should enjoy the produce of their lands.

Mao Tse-tung advises that we need not waste time grieving over mistakes made, but should strive to learn from them. And Africans have learned much since May, 1963. Tonight, therefore, I can point to certain developments worthy of note.

From the 16th century on, Portugal, has been the most relentless, most audacious and unrepentent exploiter of Africa in the world. But within recent months Portugal has undergone changes in government and policies which increasingly alarm the West. Portugal is getting out of Africa, and former Portuguese colonies are becoming African nations under their own rule.

It is important to know that revolution in Portugal did not occur because oppressed and exploited workers in that country rose to throw off their oppressors and take over the means of production. No, indeed! Portugal changed its course because black men and women, black boys and girls kept coming on against them.

Many Africans died in the most brutal ways, but the guerrilla fighters continued their determined harassment. The courageous, continual struggle, embracing all native peoples in the colonies, went on until Portugal was faced with the fact of its imminent extinction unless the government stopped sending the country's young men to die in Africa and impoverishing the already poor country for weapons and ammunition which was failing to stop the Freedom Fighters!

Guinea-Bissau, a small, largely jungle enclave on the northwest coast, was first to throw off colonial rule. After nearly two decades of armed struggle, the people succeeded in driving the Portuguese colonial army of occupation into the few urban centers, there isolating them.

With most of the country under guerrilla control, they cleared land and planted crops; a government of the Liberated Area of Guinea-Bissau was set up. And while Third World countries went about recognizing this government as the legitimate government of Guinea-Bissau and presenting it to the United Nations, the Portuguese colonial armies, cut off from supplies — surrounded by hostility, water and food giving out — had no alternative but to surrender.

And Lisbon did not consider it worthwhile to try to send additional troops which would have to battle their way through lines of determined insurgents.

For by this time, on the other side of the continent, the forces of FRELIMO, in the larger and more important colony of Mozambique, were seizing more and more territory and were demanding independence. FRELIMO had been set up by Eduardo Mondlane, a brilliant native of Mozambique.

After making a reputation for himself as a scholar, he resigned a lucrative post at the University of Syracuse and from various "advisory committees" at the United Nations, declaring that he must return to Mozambique. There he began organizing his people for armed struggle against their oppressors.

For a while we heard nothing about him. I met him in the Sudan — clear-eyes, resolute — an inspiring speaker. He was killed in East Africa in 1971, but FRELIMO kept "marching on."

When I was in the United States in 1972 some young brothers here told me that FRELIMO would never amount to much because it had whites in it. I had never heard this criticism in Africa. Later I visited a FRELIMO Camp in East Africa and everything I saw indicated that everybody there meant business.

A few months ago an amazed, incredulous world saw belted and helmeted black FRELIMO soldiers together with shile Portuguese soldiers putting down an incipient rebellion of white settlers in Mozambique who were protesting the independence which Portugal has announced for the country.

We in the Third World rejoiced, but it was widely said that things would be different in Angola, largest and richest of Portugal's colonies. Angola has been under Portugal's control for the last five hundred years and was the main economic support of that country.

For Angola, with its productive, fertile land is rich in minerals, oil and natural gas. Giant corporations, European and American, have reaped fortunes in Angola. Gulf Oil has a 150 million dollar investment in Angola. For these capitalists black rule in Angola was unthinkable.

They took comfort in the fact that unlike Guinea-Bissau and Mozambique, Angola had three Liberation Movements — so different in methods and idealogies that they spent much time disputing among themselves. For this reason, so they said, blacks would not be able to present a unified front to Portugal, and no independence could be considered.

There was basis for this point of view. The three liberation groups were indeed very far apart:

First and oldest was the National Front for the Liberation of Angola (FNLA), headed by Holden Roberto, whose brother-in-law is President Mobuto Sese Seko of Zaire. Their headquarters was in Zaire.

As far back as the First All African Peoples Conference, when in 1958 I met Mr. Roberto, the FNLA was considered an anachronistic tribal organization — not in step with the nationalist-progressive movements generally advocated in that Conference. It was said that the years had changed the FNLA into a broad-based nationalist movement.

Second, was the Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola headed by Dr. Agostinho Neto, an established Marxist intellectual. Their base was in Congo Brazzaville and in generally thought to be pro-Mao.

Third, was The National Union for the Total Independence of Angola. It is headed by Jonas Savimbi and is basically a moderate organization advocating multiracialism for Angola. This group is supported by liberal Angolan whites.

With three such dissident groups talking independence, it was thought that black control of Angola could easily be pushed off into the undefinable future. However, black folks are no more stupid than folks anywhere else!

Shortly before I left Cairo last January the three heads of Angola's Liberation Movements met in Nairobi, Kenya. In a closed room, with several members of the Organization of African Unity, they sat down and talked together. They may have quarreled. But nobody outside was the wiser.

Not one word of that conference "leaked out." The press did not know such a meeting was to be held until it was in process. And so they hung around that closed door and finally saw Holden Roberto, Jonas Savimbi and Agostinho Neto come out arm in arm.

Then the world press was informed that the three had drawn up a plan for Angola's independence which together they would present to the Portuguese government in Lisbon. Together they flew to Lisbon; together they faced Portugal's ruling body; together they submitted their proposals.

And the new Portuguese Government accepted the Proposals and scheduled Independence Day in Angola for November 11, 1975.

We have here the triumph of common sense, understanding and vision. There will be difficulties in Angola, but determined, fearless and honest people will overcome their difficulties.

Let us look at another aspect: Some in these three groups were undoubtedly wiser than others, some undoubtedly had more knowledge than others. And we have said that knowledge is power. But no one group here had all the knowledge, therefore no one group had all the power. Had the heads of these three liberation movements not realized this fact, they would not have united their efforts and faced the Portuguese together.

In the vital struggles which face us today we need each other. When an individual or a group considers that it has all the knowledge, mistakes are made which can be fateful. Let me tell you a story:

Now Moses had successfully led the Children of Israel across the Red Sea and out into the desert. He told them they were on the way to Canaan, but where that was or what it was they did not know. Day by day the desert sun seemed hotter, and hour by hour the thick sands dragged at their feet.

Food they had brought from Egypt became stale and hard; they could find no fresh water and were warned to conserve what water they had. Moses was an old man and the journey was hard enough without having to listen to complaints and grumbling. But he plodded on.

When they reached the foot of Mt. Sinai, God told Moses to let the people rest and for him to come up onto the mountain top. Moses climbed the heights — glad to get away. After he rested a while and perhaps ate some of the food of Heaven, God gave Moses the Ten Commandments which Moses wrote on two slabs of stone. And afterwards he lay down for a long and peaceful sleep.

Meanwhile on the plains below, native people of the surrounding land had come to see the mass of strangers who had evidently come from far away. Maybe they were Hittites or Canaanites, I don't know. But they were not hostile, only curious. It did not take them long to see that the strangers were foot-sore, had no fresh water and were short on food.

So they brought food and cool water and wine grapes and fruit such as the Children of Israel had never seen. You may imagine how happy the weary travelers were — how glad they were to meet up with such kind people. Then out from their village came the Hittites with musical instruments and dancing girls — and somebody bore on their shoulders a Golden Calf at which the Children of Israel stared in astonishment.

And when their new friends began dancing and singing around the Golden Calf the Children of Israel joined right in and soon everybody was dancing and singing together. And just then Moses came down from the mountain!

He didn't come all the way down and he didn't ask any questions, he just blew up with rage. He hurled down the tablets upon which he had written the Ten Commandments, breaking them into many pieces; he shouted and consigned all the people to perdition.

The Hittites were confounded to see and hear the Old Man. The Children of Israel, who had had their first good meal, with cool wine in many a day, were embarrassed before their new friends. And they were dumb before old Moses' wrath.

And then God spoke and he said: "Moses, how dare you break the tablets with those Commandments for my people! How dare you shout at them like this!"

"But God," said Moses, "don't you see what these wicked, ungrateful people are doing. They are all drunk with wine. They worship a Golden Calf. They have broken all the Commandments."

"How can the people break Commandments before they have them," inquired God. "I can see the people and I will judge them. I did not tell you to judge them. For this wrong thing that you do, you Moses shall never enter the Promised Land!"

At these words Moses was stricken with grief. And God spoke gently:

"All right, Moses, you have been a faithful servant. Come back up to the mountain top and I will once more give you the Commandments. And you will teach them to my People. And finally you shall lead them to Canaan, and I shall take you to a high place, where you will be able to look into the Promised Land — but you may never enter it."

Poor Moses! A severe punishment for hasty judgment, arrogance and impatient anger. Let us ponder on Moses' predicament. Our times are far more crucial. For imperialism is employing every device to deceive, to trap, to divide us one from the other.

Imperialism, with its exploitation, oppression and aggression is a badly wounded Beast — while Humanity is rising in strength throughout the world. Open your eyes and see. Being ignorant will not save you, and standing alone leaves you naked and defenseless. That old Spiritual...

Walk together, chillun

has more meaning now than ever before.

Lift up your heads and look beyond narrow confines! We, the people, have much cause to rejoice. Black people have cause to celebrate; the Third World, the World of Color, no longer slumbers. Everywhere there is movement, everywhere is the sound of marching feet — coming on — coming on!

excellent public schools — plus the additional opportunities offered by the College.

My eldest boy plays with the school band, while the younger is taking violin lessons every Saturday morning in the Children's Class at the Conservatory."

He nodded with approval. "You're giving them a fine start."

"I've been a long time getting to the place where I could give them this kind of schooling," I explained, "but I'm not happy about being separated from them all the time. This is the best arrangement I can make now. I do want them to have a sound education."

He was quiet for a little while, then asked what my salary was at A. and I. When I told him, he said casually, "I should think that after the boys' expenses are subtracted you don't have much left for — shall we say — trimmings."

"Oh," I said cheerfully, "I can get along without fine trimmings. There's enough for essential coverings." I indicated my inexpensive but, I thought, rather smart sport suit. "And perhaps they're not entirely essential, either." I laughed lightly.

His eyes were on a rather bad stretch in the road and he did not turn his head as he spoke dryly. "That remark is either profound or — shocking. I'll have to ponder it."

I smiled complacently. He had made me feel rather clever, even witty.

convenient to let the people understand, digest the problem. Time becomes secondary. The protest itself becomes secondary also. Awareness of the contradiction becomes primary. This is so because a mere rally will not make the trustees change their plans. Many more subsequent activities must be celebrated.

This pre-protest educational process could help many students, as well as other workers in U-Mass, realizing that they do not live in a vacuum. It will also help all of us to find out that objects and phenomena are all interrelated; what is going on in South Africa is also an integral part of my life as a human individual. Not only do I have to do something about it; but, I also have something to do about it now.

But, a good strategy with a faulty tactics is nothing. A faulty tactics may even hinder the strategy. We think this could have happened in relation to the rally on South Africa. There should be no rush in celebrating rallies. These are public demonstrations. If they turn out to be poor, it is used to harm the issue.

There are some circumstance in which few people mean a triumph, a success. If there is an opportunity for a good turn out, though, and it did not happen because of uncontrollable forces, then the activity must be postponed. There is no need to see in a newspaper that gets everywhere in the vicinity a picture showing a couple hundred people protesting for an issue with which thousands of people sympathize.

The weather in this environment could become an enemy. It could also be made into our ally. The rally to protest the presence of U-Mass in South Africa and to demand that no bonds be related to the racist regime in anyway was carried on under extremely negative conditions. This was not absolutely necessary.

We have to conclude that it is correct to try to relate the life of college students to international issues. We also think it is necessary to demand that U-Mass get out of South Africa. It is our concern as part of this institution. A rally is a good idea. It will help to blend the strength of many individuals and groups in one effective punch against the racists. Finally, we believe that more education is needed on the issue; and, that when objective conditions are not on our side, activities should not be held. We do not strike for the sake of striking.

Staffers may consider union

By BERNIE DAVIDOW
Collegian Staff

The first step toward a professional staff union on campus was taken yesterday as the six-week-old Professional Staff for Collective Bargaining (PSCB) began the process to bring the issue before the Massachusetts Labor Relations Commission.

Professional staff at the University include Physical Plant engineers and staff workers at Whitmore, health services, financial aid and the University Press.

PSCB members handed out authorization cards to about 50 staff members who attended a meeting on campus yesterday. At least 30 per cent of the about 650 professional staff must sign the cards if the group is to get the labor relations commission to authorize an election to determine whether the staff will be represented by a union.

However, by a vote of those at the meeting, the PSCB will not bring the matter to the commission unless more than half the entire professional staff signs the authorization and designation cards.

The Professional Association UMass-Amherst is the University recognized governance unit for professional staff.

PSCB wants the Massachusetts Teachers Association (MTA) for its union affiliate.

Ralph H. Flynn, an MTA organizer, said professional staff are trying to unionize "because they don't have decent evaluations or a grievance procedure." He said they are at "the whim of administrators."

David P. Sackett, one of the seven-member PSCB steering committee, said the group met with members of the MTA earlier in the semester at the MTA's North Pleasant St. office. He said PSCB wants "somebody with some expertise" in education for its affiliate.

Another member of the PSCB said the union approach is a new way of talking with the administration and not a conflict situation. It would create sensible contracts for people to work together the member said.

Puryear plan stirs dissatisfaction

This is the third in a series of articles examining University programs and majors that stand to be effected by the provost's five-year plan. The provost sent his plan to deans and directors on March 24 and has asked them to respond by April 15.

More dissatisfaction was expressed by department chairpersons over Provost Paul L. Puryear's proposed five year plan for re-allocating resources within the University in a continuing Collegian poll in the College of Arts and Sciences.

While many chairpersons said they could understand the restraints on Puryear, they disapproved of alleged unilateral policymaking.

Puryear, in a telephone interview yesterday, defended his plan. He said he did not draw upon the Academic Program Review Task Force Report, begun by former Provost Robert L. Gluckstern, for his plan.

Puryear said his plan stands on its own. He explained the methods used for his report differs from those of the task force, which Puryear said proposes "no action."

Terming the task force a "brief and broad assessment of programs on campus," Puryear said this plan made only relative funding levels and broad recommendations.

"It would be very hard to use the Task Force because of its brevity and lack of precision fiscal recommendations," said Puryear. He added he is quite willing to let his plan be widely discussed and reviewed. Puryear said he disagreed with any allegations that he ignored the Redbook, the procedural guidelines approved by the board of trustees.

Slavic Languages

Slavic Language Chairperson Laszlo M. Tikos yesterday criticized the provost plan for characterizing his department as "a good program operating within a very narrow scope."

Tikos said he challenged this position as being in conflict with the provost's own stated assumption that the liberal arts core will be the foundation of learning for both undergraduates and graduates.

Tikos cited the high nationwide ratings his UMass Slavics Department received from a recent Graduate Program Review visitation Department received from a recent Graduate Program Review visitation committee, as a criterion of quality which he said is used in support of other departments in the provost plan.

Tikos noted Slavics is planning to increase the present faculty-student ratio, 7.4:1 — well below the UMass average, by forming new courses with other humanities. The current enrollment is Slavics is 240 students, who are taught by a faculty of six, five of whom are tenured.

Linguistics

Linguistics is one of the few departments the provost does not propose to reduce. However, Chairperson Samuel J. Keyser said he is concerned with proposed cuts in other departments, particularly Slavic and Asian studies which face elimination, because Linguistics is in cooperation with other departments for "joint majors" in humanities.

Linguistics, with a faculty of eight, enrolls only 35 graduates and no department majors.

Keyser said that although the joint majors in Slavic and Asian studies do not yet number much, the program is just getting started.

Music and Dance

The Music and Dance department, like all the fine arts, will be receiving additional faculty positions in the provost's plan.

Albert G. Huetteman of a five-member departmental council, said the faculty will grow from 38 to 40. He noted one of these positions is already earmarked for a department head. More than a thousand students are enrolled in music and dance courses, said Huetteman, while there are only 200 majors.

The provost plan did not find fault with the department's low 9:1 faculty-student ratio, due to the large number of studio courses in the program. However, the plan does discourage the new doctoral degree program now being proposed by the department.

Spanish-Portuguese

A high faculty-student ratio (19:1) and an above average student demand at UMass for Spanish earned this department three additional positions in Puryear's five year plan. Chairperson Harold Boudreau yesterday said he didn't think he should comment about the allocation since so many other humanities are to be reduced.

"It's not a virtue, not a vice, just facts," remarked Boudreau about the large enrollment figures and faculty-student ratio, which both play a part in the allocation decisions in the provost's plan.

Mathematics and Statistics

The mathematics and statistics department will be slashed five positions in the provost's plan.

Chairperson Jin Chen Su said the cutback is "obviously a teaching loss." Class sizes have already increased from an average of 25 to 35 students, said Su.

Su said the faculty-student ratio in the provost's plan is not a clear picture of the actual ratios. Explaining that mathematics and statistics are two different sections with different classroom sizes, Su pointed out mathematics has a faculty-student ratio of 17:1, but statistic classes average 25 students. The average UMass faculty student ratio is 18:1.

Mathematics and statistics provide close to 2,000 students with "service courses," required for majors in professional schools and other science departments.

Su also expressed concern about the mathematics graduate program, whose future status is to be "carefully considered" in the provost's plan. If the graduate student enrollment is cut, Su warned the reduction will directly affect undergraduates.

This loss in graduate students will force a drop in available teaching assistants, now used to help professors with teaching loads.

"The most serious damage will occur at the undergraduate level," stressed Su.

He said the provost's plan will "inevitably demoralize faculty in general." According to Su, Puryear intends to deny tenure to department members.

Su complained that in the plan the provost mentions denying tenure based on the merit of the case, not the "merit of the professors."

The plan came upon the mathematics department "very suddenly."

Physics

Physics Chairperson Frederick W. Byron Jr. said there will be two main effects from the proposed cut of four faculty in the department.

He fears several areas of research will be ended, and courses could be cut unless there is a continuous drop in enrollment, as the provost plan assumes.

The graduate student program in physics could also be endangered, said Byron. If it is phased out or reduced, 80 lab sections "would wither up and die" without teaching assistant support.

Astronomy

William M. Irvine the chairperson of the Astronomy Department, said that if the graduate program is cutback, the undergraduate program will necessarily deteriorate and some professors could leave as a result.

Irvine also said monies the department receives from federal grants will be cut back if UMass cuts back.

Puryear's report gives the Astronomy Department a 24:6 student faculty ratio, which is high

Suspect arrested in sideswipe case

By MICHAEL McHUGH
Collegian Staff

The person who was speeding away from a UMass cruiser sideswiped by another car on Meadow St. April 2, was arrested Sunday, April 10, by a combined investigation of the Amherst Police Department and UMass Department of Public Safety.

Kevin R. Longto, 18, of 131 Pelham Rd., Amherst, was issued a citation for speeding, failure to stop for a police officer, operating a motor vehicle to endanger, and a stop sign violation.

As reported in the April 5 Collegian, three members of the UMass Department of Public Safety had been hospitalized on April 2 when their cruiser was struck on the left side by a car crossing over the traffic lines on Meadow St. Chief Robert Joyce had explained that the cruiser had been in pursuit of a motor vehicle that had been speeding in back of North Village. As the cruiser approached North Pleasant St., a vehicle crossed over the traffic line and crashed into the cruiser. The driver of the car that crossed the traffic line was cited for failure to stay within the marked lines. The speeding car had gotten away but the Department of Public Safety had a good description, which lead to Longto's arrest on April 10.

A person was arrested last Saturday night in a Gorman dormitory lounge for stealing a pizza from the Whole-Wheat Pizza factory deliverer.

Shortly after midnight on April 8, Don W. Kibbe, 22, of Raggard Hill Rd., West Brookfield, was arrested in parking lot 49 near Grayson, for driving under the influence of alcohol, according to the UMass Department of Public Safety.

A trash barrel fire in the third floor janitor's closet of McNamara dormitory, was extinguished by the sprinkler system on April 7 around 10 p.m. It was the second such fire in a week at Sylvan Area, which prompted the label "suspicious origin" fire by the Department, and it is currently under investigation. There was a similar fire in Brown on April 2.

The Department reported that a breaking and entering took place between April 8 and 10 at Van Meter Dormitory. A stereo system that consisted of an Onkyo receiver, a turntable, a cassette tape player, and four Advent speakers valued at $1600 were all stolen out of a locked room.

Sometime between April 9 and 10, a convertible parked outside Webster Dormitory was broken into. A set of Titlist Golf clubs, a radio set, and ski boots valued at $700 were stolen. The Department reported that entry was gained by cutting though the convertible's top.

Four chrome wire wheel hubcaps and two Firestone steel belted tires valued at $600 were stolen from a 1977 Cadillac parked in Lot 21. The theft took place between April 6 and 7.

A Schwinn 3-speed bicycle valued at $120 was stolen outside the UMass library between April 7 and 8. The Department reported that the bicycle had been secured with a bicycle lock.

Poor Richards stays open

Selectmen drop penalty

By TERESA M. HANAFIN
Collegian Staff

Poor Richard's will serve liquor tonight.

As a result of an Amherst Board of Selectmen vote last night, the Rte. 9 discotheque will be allowed to serve alcoholic beverages to its patrons tonight, tomorrow, Thursday and Friday.

The board voted to temporarily suspend a four-day penalty it had imposed on the Amherst bar two weeks ago, pending an appeal the bar has made to the Alcoholic Beverages Commission (ABC).

Poor Richard's had its liquor license suspended by the selectmen on March 28 after a Hampshire County Court found the bar guilty of having served alcoholic beverages to two minors on the night of Jan. 19.

The board voted to allow the bar to serve liquor until the ABC can hear their appeal, which will not be until around May 26.

The selectmen decided that if the appeal is not successful and the bar has to still serve its penalty, then it will not be served until September when area colleges are in session and the "full impact of the penalty is felt," said Selectmen Nancy B. Eddy.

The bar is basing its appeal on "extenuating circumstances" and is asking instead for a verbal reprimand from the selectmen, according to Stephen Monson, attorney for the H.L. Hand Co., owners of the bar.

Monson said the minors admitted in court that they had used "evasive tactics" to get past the identification checking system used by Poor Richard's.

At the selectmen's meeting two weeks ago, Monson maintained that the parents of the minors should be punished instead of Poor Richard's.

"Poor Richard's has enough business that they don't have to cater to the underaged," he said at that time.

In other action, the board approved the location of a non-profit corporation to be in the Fine Arts Center.

The name of the corporation is The Commonwealth Stage, Ltd. and will be located in 125B Fine Arts Center.

The board elected Diana Romer as the new chairperson of the board after Eddy declined to run for re-election.

Citing a busy schedule and a conviction that the chairmanship should change hanas regularly, Eddy withdrew her name from contention but was chosen vice-chairperson. William Atkins was elected clerk.

Last night marked the first meeting for new members Nathaniel Reed and Roger Jacque, recently elected to their posts.

The board also requested that Town Manager A. Louis Hayward request greater cooperation from the Amherst Police Dept. in rounding up stray dogs, especially in apartment complexes in Amherst.

The agenda item was introduced by Eddy, who cited numerous complaints she has received from people who complain about dog problems and claim they never get any response.

Hayward said there were "reservations" on the part of Amherst Police Chief Donald Maia regarding enforcing Amherst year-old leash law on private property such as apartment complexes.

Eddy reminded the board that the town's counsel had assured them that it would be legal for the police to respond to calls which would take them to apartment complexes.

Hayward said a meeting has been set up for tomorrow with representatives of 10 or 12 of the largest apartment complexes in the area to come to an agreement about the enforcement of the leash law.

The board recommended that the Amherst School Committee reduce their assessment for their fiscal year 1977 budget because of an estimated $60,000 overpayment by the state to the town.

Cherry sheets for the regional school districts show $72,000 more than had been anticipated, with about $60,000 of that going to Amherst.

With the extra money, the school committee should lower their budget request accordingly, according to Romer. However, the committee has discovered a "shortfall of funds" in their original budget of almost $135,000. They therefore want to use the sudden abundance from the state to cover that deficit.

"If the school committee is going to be getting funding from the state just like town hall, then they are going to have to learn to live with whatever they get just as we do," Romer said.

MSP selecting committees

By ROBIN COSTELLO
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts Society of Professors (MSP), has begun a two stage process to elect representatives to a negotiating committee which will eventually meet with the UMass Board of Trustees, Kenneth M. Dolbeare, secretary of the MSP, said last night.

Members of the MSP are currently selecting a representative from each department on campus for the committee. Dolbeare said the second requires the committee to select members who will represent the colleges within the university in proportion to the size of departments and schools.

The faculty group was elected to represent UMass faculty in elections February 8 and 9. The Board of Trustees voted in March not to recognize the group on the grounds that certain personnel should not be included in the unit, specifically; Department Chairpersons, certain part-time faculty, certain visiting faculty and certain faculty who are being paid by non-state funds.

According to Dolbeare, if Trustees are ready to bargain next week, by reversing their March vote, "We'll be ready."

In other action, MSP organizer Ralph H. Flynn announced yesterday that the Union will be picketing at Whitmore again tomorrow. He said the picket will begin at noon.

CAC approves coffeehouse

By ROSEMARY CONWAY

Steven Howard and Karen Fitzpatrick from the Students United for Public Education (SUPE) spoke to the Central Area Council last night on Budget Cuts and monies were appropriated for two coffeehouses to be held in the area.

SUPE representatives Howard and Fitzpatrick explained the group's goal to be to inform the student body of the facts of budget cutting as it affects them as participants in public education.

The organizations four principles are 1) No budget cuts 2) No tuition hikes 3) No public monies to private schools and 4) No students or faculty on budget cutting committees.

Howard said, "clearly with the state we (public education) are on the bottom of the list of priorities. The quality of public education is decreasing while costs are increasing. More state aid is going to private schools while public education is getting level spending."

Howard said students should not comply by serving on budget cut committees. "We will not take part in the cutting of our own throats," he said.

Jon Hite, Student Senate co-president, who came to the CAC to speak on the budget cut, check cashing, and the Provost's Five-Year Plan, joined Howard and President Janice Perry in urging members of the CAC to write to their representatives and senators to protest level funding, and to ask friends and family to do the same.

Perry said, "write to your state legislators. Tell them that you feel UMass is worth saving. If students don't show an active interest their representatives won't fight for more money."

A petition to sign and a list of representativeu to write to are available at the SUPE table in the Campus Center.

Dorms who are interested in having a guest speaker from the SUPE should contact Steven Howard or Janice Perry.

Money was allocated to Baker Dormitory for a coffeehouse starting from 9 to 9:30 p.m. $75 was given for musicians, sound equipment and refreshments.

$155 was approved for a Butterfield-New World Center coffeehouse to be held Saturday April 23 at 9 p.m. in Butterfield Dormitory. There will be two disc jockeys and refreshments at the event.

The CAC also appropriated money for "White Roots of Peace," an activity to be held May 5-7. Josh Gordon of The Cultural Education Development Project said the events will feature six speakers, aztec dancing, films and other activities concerned with the Native American.

Some topics which will be discussed are, "The Psychology of Racism", "Native American Art and Theater," and "Aztec Astronomy and Mathematics."

President Perry announced that dorms interested in having workshops on the dynamics of off-campus living should contact the Off-Campus Housing Office.

Elections for CAC officers will be Thursday, April 21 from 11 a.m. to 7 p.m. at Franklin Dining Commons.

Candidates nomination papers with the 50 signatures are due Tuesday, April 19 at 7 p.m. instead of Monday because of the holiday.

For the same reason the next meeting of the CAC will be held Tuesday, April 19 at 7:15 p.m.

Injunction settled, pledge rescinded

By LARRY COHEN
Collegian Staff

An injunction hearing on the $300 Southwest Assembly pledge to the Multiple Sclerosis dance-a-thon was settled out of court last night, according to SWA president Chris Durkin.

The SWA had voted on March 29 to sponsor the dance team of Joe Abel and Gail Syphers for $10 an hour for every hour they could dance in the 30-hour event. According to the agreement between Durkin and Don Bishop, who filed the injunction petition last week, the motion to pledge the money must be rescinded.

Bishop filed the injunction petition after the SGA refused to grant $500 to the dance team. Bishop told the Collegian he started the petition as an interested student who questioned the legality of area governments funding campus-wide events.

The Assembly may re-allocate the funds, as long as it follows the SGA guidelines of notifying the senate finance committee ten days before voting on the issue. According to the agreement, the donation may still go under the name of Abel and Syphers, under the stipulation that it does not contribute to any "personal benefit" derived by the recipients of such an allocation.

The pair who collected the most money in pledges for the dance-a-thon would receive a free trip to either Europe or Montego Bay. Both Syphers and Abel deny the trip is the reason they entered the dance-a-thon.

"The main thing is that the money is donated," said Abel. "It's not important to me or my partner whether it is donated in our name or not."

Symposium aids GSEU

By ALAN LEVIN
Collegian Staff

Students from several universities gathered here last weekend to discuss the common problems of unionizing graduate student employees. The symposium, sponsored by the Political Science Department, was held to boost the fledgling Graduate Student Employees Union (GSEU) here at UMass.

The GSEU is an organization of graduates students employed by the University as teaching assistants, research assistants and the like. They are currently seeking recognition from the State Labor Relations Board.

The symposium was host to students representing graduate unions from the State University of New York, the University of Wisconsin and the University of Michigan.

"We were asking what lessons they (the above students) might impart on a youthful organization like ours," Michael Forster, a GSEU spokesman said.

The need for a broad base of grass roots support was stressed by veteran representatives in attendance. Without strong graduate student support a union is severely weakened, they claimed.

A union must also have a coherent legal stance, a program which meets the needs of its constituency and the mutual support of local unions to survive, the students concluded. The danger of trusting the school's administration was emphasized, as well.

One of the main areas concerning the graduate students is the lack of a mouth piece for University employe grievances. Their gripes include:

— The absence of job security. Grads are given jobs on a one year basis. They must reapply each year.

—The failure of the University to pay the agreed upon sum of $3,600 a year for work totaling 20 hours per week.

— The failure to increase pay in accordance with the rise in the cost of living.

— The cutback in the number of graduate employees.

— The lack of any comprehensive guideline for hiring and firing.

— The tendency, in general, of not giving graduates control over course content.

"We want to do whatever we can within the limits of the law because we know some people are suffering injustices," concluded Forster.

Flying Club mishap damages plane

By PAUL YANOWITCH
Collegian Staff

A plane owned and operated by the UMass Flying Club crashed yesterday afternoon during an attempted landing at the Turners Falls Airport, resulting in no harm to the two occupants, but substantial damage to the plane and the surrounding area.

The plane, a single engine, two seater Cessna 150 was piloted at the time of the crash by Francis Sullivan, an instructor at the airport. The other occupant was a UMass student taking lessons, Todd Gunderson.

The plane crashed about 100 yards short of the runway, and now lies cradled amid a patch of trees near the runway. The plane is worth approximately $5000, according to Jeff Phillips, vice-president of the club.

A team of investigators from the Federal Aviation Administration (FAA) will arrive at the scene of the crash today and attempt to determine the cause. Phillips said that "in a situation like this, it is unavoidable that the pilot will be made to look bad, but that is usually not the case. Mother nature and bad luck could cause such an accident."

"He (Sullivan) is an extremely skilled and competent pilot, and I have flown with him before," Phillips added.

The FAA will hold a full hearing upon completion of their investigation, and will then decide upon any disciplinary action, if it is proves necessary. "If the situation warrants it, they can suspend the pilot's license and levy a fine," said Ralph Maurl, supervisor of the FAA station at Windsor Locks, Conn.

President of the Flying Club, Tim Blagan, had no comment on the crash.

"All the members who fly are covered by insurance," Phillips said. There are currently 20 members who do fly, and 10-15 social members of the club.

She gets her last wish-- they'll bury her in Ferrari

LOS ANGELES (UPI) — Without ruling on the validity of the wills, a judge gave the go-ahead yesterday for a wealthy Beverly Hills woman to realize her last wish and be buried in her luxury sports car "with the seat comfortably slanted."

The body of Sandra Ilene West, 36, temporarily has been entombed at a masoleum in San Antonio, Tex., pending a probate hearing on two wills Mrs. West left when she died at her home March 10.

One of the wills specified the unique burial request, while the other will had no burial instructions.

Superior Court Commission Franklin Dana said the woman's burial request, made in a 1972 handwritten will, was "unusual, but not illegal."

"Her instructions should be carried out," he said. "I know of no law either here or in Texas forbidding this type of burial."

Political life no ill effect - Eddy

By JON WALTERS
Collegian Staff

If being the husband of a woman awash in the waters of Amherst politics carries any lasting ill effects or involves too much hardship, you could not prove it by Phillip Eddy. Husband of recently re-elected selectman Nancy Eddy, he has been a politician's spouse for some six years.

Veiling a distant exasperation with his wife's political involvement, Eddy heaped praise on her. "From a purely political standpoint I wish she were home more often, but I am not at all negative about her involvement in politics. She believes in what she is doing. She is a model of what a woman should be in our society."

Eddy, who teaches philosophy of education here at the University, said that his wife's career has not called for all that much adjustment on his part.

"Of course I have to spend a bit more time at home and I have to jockey my schedule around a bit especially around town meeting time." Otherwise, Eddy maintained, he could function routinely.

When asked what effect having a working mother had on his seventh and fifth grade children Eddy implied that the effects were negligible and that they would become even more so as the kids get older. "The only adverse effect might be the increased tension in the house."

Since the job of selectman is volunteer and a selectman's home is also his or her office, it is apparently impossible not to bring the job home.

"I can only remember a few times when it was a problem though," said Eddy. "Once when the Northeast by-pass (a proposal which Nancy Eddy supported) was defeated." When things get too tense Eddy said that he will tell his wife. "She is very responsive," he said.

When asked if he ever had to deal with town issues on behalf of his wife Eddy made it clear that that was her department not his.

"I refer all irate phone calls to her," he said. He also pointed out that Amherst is seldom the stage for any very volatile political issues.

Eddy did say that he does support his wife both publically and privately though and that he also acts as confidant and advisor. "I always talk things over with her. I definitely have an affect on the decisions she comes to, but mainly I just help her work things through," he said.

Eddy himself has no political ambitions whatsoever. In that respect, he said, there are no two people more unlike each other than he and his wife. "It's mainly a social thing. She has always been socially active," he said.

Eddy said that he is not jealous of his wife or her career, only that he is perhaps a little envious. He said that he wished he could be more socially and politically active and attributed much of his wife's political success and activeness to her social activeness.

"But I grew up on a farm, very isolated," he said. "My wife wishes I could be more sociable too."

Married in 1959 Eddy said that his wife's becoming a Selectman has not had a profound effect on their relationship, that it has always been strong. "It would have to be a pretty stable marriage to survive this," he said referring to his wife's six year career as selectman.

Eddy asserted that his wife's case was definitely not a classic one of a house-wife embarking on a career. "She has always been politically active and housework was always pretty much a 50-50 proposition in our household anyway," he said.

Women oppressed by social violence

By SUSAN MCDONALD
Collegian Staff

Women as an oppressed class have faced systematic violence throughout history, according to Molly O'Neil at the workshop on Women and Violence," last night at Hampshire College, attended by 10 women.

"Foot binding is no different than platform shoes; clitoridectomy is the same as birth control pills," said O'Neil, a counselor for rape victims at Hampshire College.

Readings ranging from Exodus to recent FBI reports were presented by O'Neil, Debbie Pfeiffenberger and Karin Krut. Pfeiffenberger and Krut helped to found a center for battered wives in New Britain, Conn. Krut is a student at Hampshire College.

A description of foot binding in China was presented by Pfeiffenberger. A tiny foot, "proof of femininity", symbolized the sociological and psychological inferiority of women. According to Pfeiffenberger, the male attitude was, "women who don't bind their feet look like men."

Krut read a description of clitoridectomy, the surgical removal of the clitoris. "It causes intense pain and suffering, both physical and psychological, and insures women's subjugation in society," Clitoridectomy is still performed among many peoples of the world, according to Krut.

O'Neil gave an account of mass rapes during World War Two. "In one Urkrainian village all the women were raped," said O'Neil.

According to FBI reports, one rape occurred every nine minutes in 1975 said Krut. "These are of course only reported rapes," O'Neil added.

A discussion followed the presentation. "Violence perpetrated by men upon women is correct social behavior. The power relationship is set up by society," said one woman.

"Violence always comes down from the top," said another. "Heterosexuality oppresses all women, but it's rigidified, systematic violence, sanctioned by society."

Justifiable violence, in the form of self-defense, was discussed. "A woman who kills the man who raped her isn't being violent. She's dealing with him on the same level he set up. She objectifies him as he objectified her."

"Sometimes I get angry and feel like a killer. But I can't do that. I'm too well-behaved," said a participant in the discussion.

Most of the participants agreed that women have the same capacity for violence as men. "Women have a new responsibility, to direct the energy of their violence," said O'Neil. "There's an indigenous brand of violence we don't even know about yet," she added.

"We need to develop new types of relationships," said Krut, to channel our new-found energy and capacity for violence.

The series continues tonight, with a discussion on rape and its definition, on the third floor of Hampshire College Library, in the Googie Withers room at 7:30 p.m. On Wednesday at 7:30 in Merrill Housemaster living room, Krut will present an analysis of wife beating

Tiny Pyramids showcase poetic odyssey of growth

By MORSE R. DIGGS
Collegian Staff

Tiny Pyramids is a showcase for actors, singers, dancers, musicians, and poets. The production played this past weekend to enthusiastic audiences at Hampshire College. Saturday night's sold out benefit performance for the Craemen Gethers Defense Fund raised fifty dollars.

Utilizing poetry of an urban setting, the play proceeds through the odyssey of growth. Melinda Goodman, narrator and co-director with Frieda Jones, reads her poetry to introduce the many phases of growth including the high school trip, the hang-out trip, the man-woman trip, and the searching identification trip.

The play begins with a description of the destructive negative reinforcement children acquire from standards like the song, "Rock a Bye Baby, Cradle Will Fall". Ada Griffin told of popular children games such as Punch Box, where the objective was to hit someone else.

Through the creative talents of the cast and the unpredictable story line of youth, the audience is delightfully unsure of what may happen next. An example of this is the effective use of studio players, along with players outside the studio who can be seen. At one point there is a disco scene inside, while outside a car pulls up with a group of young ladies. They jump out of the car and run into the studio to join the party during the high school segment. The sensation of the outside-inside effect is one of immediacy, a happening.

The production is highlighted throughout by stellar dance performances by Lauren Price, Ann Dudley, and Susan Seizer.

Tiny Pyramids is a completely original production that provides refreshing entertainment.

Bill designed to implement ERA

BOSTON (AP) — For the first time in state history men could be charged with prostitution and a woman could be sued for non-support by her husband under a sweeping package of legislation designed to implement the state Equal Rights Amendment.

A package containing some 160 separate pieces of legislation to bring state laws into compliance with the state ERA was reported out favorably by the judiciary committee yesterday.

The state ERA was approved by the voters last November.

Sen. Alan D. Sisitsky, D-Springfield, Senate committee chairman, ramrodded the package through to the applause of proponents moments after its public hearing. Rep. Genevra Counihan, D-Concord, and Sisitsky voted for the package. Rep. Robert G. Phelan, D-Lynn, the only other committee member present, abstained from voting. House Chairman Rep. Michael Flaherty, D-Boston, was not present at the hearing or for the vote.

Sisitsky said that when the measure reaches the Senate floor he will move to separate out a provision which would abolish absolute veterans preference in civil service.

"It's a question of tactics," Sisitsky explained. "If that's the most controversial part, it's best to hold it back and let the rest of it pass."

for the University. According to the report, the Physics and Astronomy departments will lose four faculty between them in the next five years.

Microbiology

The Microbiology Department, with nine out of its 10 faculty tenured, is not scheduled to lose any faculty in the next five years, according to the provost's proposal.

While the report questions the department's graduate program, Chairperson Robert P. Mortlock said that out of the 29 doctorates handed out since the program's inception in 1962, 28 of the people currently have jobs in related positions.

Mortlock said "It's not a happy time to be a department head." He said he would resign if the University were willing to hire a replacement.

Enrollments in micro courses taught for other majors is rising, he said, and will mean crowded labs in the near future if additional professors cannot be hired.

Polymer Science and Engineering

This program does no teaching at the undergraduate level, but relies heavily on other programs which are being cut back in the training of its students, according to Chairperson William J. MacKnight.

"The major point of the plan is that it's tentative. We have to believe it and the provost will have to consult with the faculty" before finalizing the plan, he said.

MacKnight said his program is an "applied discipline" which requires the support of the more basic disciplines such as chemistry.

Sociology

Sociology Chairperson N.J. Demerath said the substance of the provost's report is less important than the way he went about presenting it.

He said the faculty have been "moved like pawns on a chessboard."

The sociology student faculty ratios presented in the proposal are incorrect according to Demerath, because the department usually has about one-third of its faculty engaged in research, which means a reduced course load.

According to the report, the department will lose one faculty member in the next five years.

Demerath said there are about 250 to 300 majors with 2400 to 3000 students enrolled in courses. Seventy per cent of the faculty is tenured, he said.

Economics

This department received a favorable review in the provost's report, and is scheduled to receive seven additional faculty in the next five years.

Department head Donald Katzner said eight faculty have left in the past few years "because they could get better money elsewhere."

According to the report, while additional resources will be shifted to the department, "relatively few tenure earning positions will be granted until the durability of the student demand is determined."

Katzner said this could have an adverse effect on untenured faculty. There are currently 16 to 17 faculty untenured he said.

While the report "did come out rather fast" Katner said he had no objections to it otherwise.

Political Science

Acting head Lewis C. Mainzer said he objected to the provost's justification of declining enrollment in the department since he only used figures from the previous and current years to make his arguments.

According to Mainzer, "There is no possibility of reasonable decisions being taken on the basis of the plan" because some professors have already been rejected for tenure on the grounds of increased flexibility for the University, one of the assumptions listed by Punyear in his proposal.

The report indicates political science will lose four faculty in the next five years out of its current 32. Mainzer said there are about 29 faculty tenured.

He said there are about 450 majors in the department, w1ith roughly 2200 to 2300 students enrolled in department courses at the graduate and undergraduate level.

Anthropology

The Anthropology program is already at a "breaking point" in the number of faculty required to teach their courses, according to department chairperson Donald Proulx.

Proulx said that if they lose two more positions, as the Puryear memo proposes, the quality of the graduate program will decline.

The five or six untenured faculty are "nervous" about the plan, he said out of the 17 faculty now in the department.

There are 180 majors in the program, he said, with a student-faculty ratio of 15:1.

Proulx said he objected to the way Puryear derived his figures, since he did not take into account faculty who were on sabbatical or on leave without pay. He said there are about 13 faculty teaching this semester.

The department just completed an "extensive review" of his graduate program, he said, referring to Puryear's statement in the memo that the graduate program needs to be "carefully assessed".

Communications Studies

The chairperson of Communications Studies said he is "pleased that the provost sees us as a growth area and that he recommended keeping our faculty size."

Chairperson Kenneth Brown said he objected to the report's allegations that his department overlapped with courses in other departments such as English, Journalism, Rhetoric and Comparative Literature.

He said the report was inconsistent because in the summaries for these other departments, no mention of overlap appeared.

Brown said that the issue of overlap has been discussed for many years, but when it is actually examined there is little overlap in subject areas.

There are about 60 to 65 per cent of the 20 Communications Studies Dept. faculty tenured he said.

Brown said that while enrollments in the department have been increasing over the years, the number of professors teaching has dropped.

In 1974 there were 25 faculty teaching 225 majors, he said and currently there are 524 majors being taught by 20 faculty.

GSS adopts election laws

By D. PETERSON
Collegian Staff

The Graduate Student Senate (GSS) last night adopted regulations for the coming election of GSS officers which will take place at an open meeting to be held April 20.

The regulation passed states that nominations will be open until immediately before the election.

"Any graduate student currently enrolled at the University is eligible to run for election to any of the four offices in the Senate" the document states.

Current officers of the GSS urged minority candidates to run for office.

It is stated that if the positions are contested, there will be a secret ballot of the senators. Last year's elections were uncontested. Results of the balloting will be announced at the meeting.

In the case that there might be dispute concerning the rules of the election, the GSS will form an Ad-Hoc elections committee of three members to settle the dispute.

In other action, the GSS passed without opposition a motion that states the body's general disapproval of the Puryear plan, which urges an educational concentration of courses related to professional and career objectives as opposed to liberal arts interests.

A motion asking for a reconsideration of the Arts Council Student Ticket Subsidy, in which the amount alloted to the council would be reduced was defeated after much debate.

"We have to evaluate birds in hand or birds in bushes," said vice president Timothy Austin concerning the FAC tickets. He said that GSS constituents want the reduced rates on their tickets, but they will pay the price if the FAC does not get funding and raises the price of event tickets instead. Either way the Fine Arts Council would function and without the subsidy the student would just pay more," Austin said.

The next meeting of the GSS will be an open meeting held on April 20. All graduate students are urged to attend as this meeting will concern the election of officers.

Evans operation successful

HOLYOKE, Mass. (AP) — Deborah A. Evans, the only survivor of a brutal gunshot attack that left three members of her household dead, appeared Monday night to have successfully pulled through seven hours of delicate surgery. Police still were looking for the assailant.

Doctors at Holyoke Hospital operated last Friday on Miss Evans, 19, to remove a bullet apparently lodged below her left eye.

The Holyoke Community College student was listed Monday night in guarded condition, as she had been since she was rushed to the hospital March 21.

On that brisk Monday morning, police found Miss Evans critically wounded and her mother, grandmother and an elderly boarder all dead at the family's Easthampton home.

All four victims were shot in the head at close range. Telephone wires were cut outside the house and a window in a back door smashed to gain entry.

Killed were Velma P. Kulis, 69; her daughter, Mozelle J. Evans, 47, and a boarder, George Healey, 77. The attack apparently took place during the night.

Dist. Atty. John M. Callahan, maintaining his refusal to comment on specifics of the investigation, said last week he expected to solve the case.

WASHINGTON: Paul Warnke, chief U.S. negotiator in the disarmament talks with Moscow, said Sunday the United States will pour billions of dollars into weapons development if it fails to reach agreement with the Kremlin in a "relatively short" time. Warnke appeared on CBS's "Face the Nation". (UPI)

US enforces fishing limit law

BOSTON (UPI) – Coast Guard cutters yesterday tied up a Soviet trawler in Boston Harbor and shepherded a Russian refrigerator ship toward port in the first major test of America's new 200-mile fishing limit law. The State Department officially warned the Soviet Union against continued fishing violations.

The 275-foot trawler Taras Shevchenko, taken on the high seas at 1 a.m. Sunday, was the first foreign vessel seized under the six-week old law designed to protect and preserve the U.S. fishing industry.

Cutters also escorted the 503-foot refrigerator ship Antanas Snechkus, mother ship of the Soviet fishing fleet off New England, toward port.

Coast Guard officials said 50 tons of fish in the vessel's holds had been confiscated and that possibly the ship itself would be seized on arrival in Boston, expected early today.

In Washington, deputy Secretary of State Warren Christopher summoned Vladillen Vasev, minister of the Soviet embassy, and warned him continued fishing violations could worsen relations between the two countries.

A State Department statement said Christopher asked "that extraordinary measures be taken by the Soviets to ensure that the violations cease so that this situation will not contribute to a worsening of our bilateral relations."

In Boston, U.S. Attorney James Gabriel decided to wait to press charges against the Taras Shevchenko until a review of its logs and fish catch was finished. He said part of the problem was that the vessel's documents were written in Russian and interpreters would be needed.

Gabriel also said part of the delay was in "trying to understand the regulations ourselves." He said they had "brand new statutes which haven't yet been interpreted."

The federal government can detain the trawler for "a reasonable length of time," he said.

An official from the Soviet embassy in New York was traveling to Boston yesterday to be with the 93 detained crewmembers of the Taras Shevchenko.

The Antanas Snechkus was boarded Sunday morning by Coast Guard personnel and National Marine Fisheries Service agents about 160 miles east-southeast of Nantucket Island.

Seizure of the Taras Shevchenko took place without resistance from the Soviet crew, said Alan B. Smith, commander of the cutter Decisive which escorted the ship into Boston.

"The members of the Soviet crew were hospitable at all times. There were no problems in that respect," Smith said.

Three Coast Guard officers and two National Marine Fisheries agents boarded the Taras Shevchenko by rope ladder.

Fisheries special agent Robert Gowell was one of the five. "One of us went into the master's cabin where the ship's logs and other assorted papers were inspected," he said.

"Others inspected the bridge, the three freezer holes and the processing area."

About one hour after the boarding it was determined there were possible violations, he said.

USSR charges Carter's human rights campaign hypocritical

MOSCOW (UPI) – The Soviet Union yesterday said the hypocrisy of President Carter's human rights campaign is reflected in the "genocide" of American Indians and U.S. support of regimes that "brutally suppress human rights."

"The Indian population, the national minority most oppressed in the United States, has fallen victim to genocide, that gravest crime," the official Soviet news agency Tass said.

"There are only 800,000 Indians left in America," Tass said. "they were forcibly herded into reservations; their lot is hunger, disease, dire poverty.

"In the international scene Washington gives extensive military and economic aid to the regimes which brutally suppress human rights – The Republic of South Africa, Israel, Chile, South Korea, Haiti, Paraguay, Nicaragua, Guatemala."

Tass attacked the United States for failing to ratify various international conventions on prevention of genocide and racial discrimination and covenants guaranteeing economic, social, cultural, civil and political rights.

It said racism was deeply rooted in America and "fully crosses out the Declaration of Independence which proclaimed all people equal."

"All this lays bare once again the hypocricy of official Washington, which grossly interferes into affairs of other states under a false pretext of defending human rights," Tass said.

The Soviet party daily Pravda also attacked Carter yesterday, saying Radio Liberty and Radio Free Europe "have long been, even formally, subordinated to the Central Intelligence Agency."

Pravda called a reference to the Helsinki accords in Carter's budget request for the two stations as "untenable ... since the activities of Radio Liberty and Radio Free Europe have nothing in common with the further improvement of radio news service mentioned in the report to Congress.

Conflicting ideologies cause political confusion in Italy

ROME (AP) – It's not like father like son in Italy. Children of the Communist party chief attend religion classes, and at least two children of the Christian Democrat party leader have bolted to the far left.

These are the contrasts in a nation whose diversified political life is dominated by two conflicting ideologies – Marxism and the church – and whose 57 million people are strongly individualistic.

"Tot capita tot sententiae" – "As many opinions are there are heads," Cicero's evaluation of ancient Roman politics, seems to be still accurate 2,000 years later.

Communist party leader Enrico Berlinguer was married in church and he often waits in a car outside while his wife Letizia, a devout Roman Catholic, attends Sunday Mass. Their children are proficient in religion classes, and priests are often among the guests at their official party residence.

Benigno Zaccagnini is secretary of the church-backed party that has governed Italy for the past 30 years. His only daughter, Livia, 30, is an official of Italy's Proletarian Unity party, a splinter group to the left of the Communists.

And his oldest son Carlo, 29, is a follower of "Lotta Continua" – Continuing Struggle – one of the most violent Marxist groups that rejects Berlinguer's pro-Western statements. Carlo Zaccagnini is also an acclaimed political cartoonist, and his father is often among his victims.

The Catholic church here has frequently repeated that Catholicism and Marxism are irreconcilable. But a poll taken last year showed Italians evenly divided on the question of whether it was possible to be a good Communist and a good Catholic at the same time.

Sociologists say this should come as no surprise in a nation of individuals who support at least a dozen political parties but give none a commanding majority in parliament.

Still, the Berlinguers' position is somewhat unusual since, as one Soviet newsmen noted, an official could hardly make it in a Communist-ruled country if he failed to raise his children as good atheists.

The Italian party was still closely toeing the Moscow line 20 years ago when Berlinguer, a little-known Sardinian party official, married Letizia, a Roman whose uncle is a priest.

A priest permitted them to marry in church only after the Marxist pledged that he would not obstruct baptism and religious education for their children.

Students to lose with union?

To the Editor:

Student unionization has been an issue on this campus for quite a while now. For 20 months or so we have been bombarded with rhetoric concerning our "right" to collectively bargain with the Administration of this institution. However, those who feel obligated to educate the rest of the student body on this subject have failed to explain what it is that we, the students, have to bargain with. Until now ...

In his commentary, "Bargaining Rights For Students", [April 5, 1977] Greg Tarpinian states: "We do have a basis upon which to bargain with: How is it that a University will exist without tuition paying students?"

I am shocked by the sheer ignorance of such a statement. Assuming that Mr. Tarpinian is serious, one has to consider several points.

1. There are approximately 24,000 students of this campus. How does one propose to organize such a mass into a unified group?

If Mr. Tarpinian will look through past copies of the Collegian, he will find that similar movements were rejected by the students of UMass.

In the late 60's and early 70's student strikes were organized to protest University policies. I cannot remember any classes being cancelled by the efforts, much less shutting down the entire school. The grand effect of the activities was that some students missed classes. That happens often enough without the benefit of a strike.

2. The economic threat which the unionization movement pins its hopes on just isn't there. For every student who refuses to pay his or her tuition, there is someone else out there who will. Even if a significant number of students were to withhold their tuiton and fees [10 per cent or 2,400 students], the Administration could make up the loss in other areas. For every tuition dollar lost, the University could make up two by cutting back on services, upkeep, and payroll. The University is in bad enough shape as it is.

3. Even if the unionization movement were successful in organizing the entire student body, no strike would last more than a few days. The Administration, the Faculty, and the staff of this university would have nothing to lose by a strike. In fact, they could look forward to a few days off, with pay.

The students, on the other hand, would have a great deal to lose. Were a strike to take place, eventually most of the students would realize that they are in no position to change the University. They would return to the classroom before their absence had an effect on their grades.

I don't wish to be the bearer of bad tidings, but the students of this university have to realize that they simply don't count. They are just the necessary evil which keeps the faculty and staff of this institution employed. Witness the fact that the various offices of the University don't have to take responsibility for their own actions.

The only way we can effect a change within the Administration, is to use their system to our benefit.

The Student Senate can organize an investigative committee to document fiscal abuses, violations of student rights, or other assorted irresponsibilities.

No matter what the prevailing student opinion, the Board of Trustees, the Massachusetts State Government, or the courts cannot ignore documented evidence.

Incidentally, nothing aggravates a bureaucrat more than having the bureaucracy used against him.

The funds for such a committee I have suggested are currently available. The Senate could transfer funds from the subsidized unionization movement to the committee.

The major point is that the students have to follow a responsible course of action. Withholding tuition is not responsible, because it removes a person from a position of being useful in the fight for student rights. As soon as one refuses to pay, that person becomes an ex-student, no longer part of the University. Therefore, his or her opinions are not of concern to the University.

The youth movement has grown up. Let's let the "right on" days rest in the peace they so justly deserve. Those days served as the foundation of what we are today. I'm not suggesting apathy. I'm advocating that we learn from what happened a few years ago. I'm suggesting we progress with the times.

We have the knowledge that we are a group to be reckoned with. We can be and many times are right.

Let's not allow our power and correctness to be diffused by mindless, illogical rhetoric.

The only function rhetoric serves is to make the useless who spout it feel useful. Nothing else.

Women in sports: Unite

To the Editor:

This letter goes out to all women in the area. To all of us women who at one time or another, were picked last at recess to be on a team, or think that muscles are unfeminine. To those of us who love the feeling of pushing our bodies to their fullest potential and those of us who've been frustrated at the lack of a backstop on the softball field. How about those of us who want to shoot baskets but find there's rarely any space on the courts? There are those of us who want to overcome fears and stereotypes and join with others for health and recreation. And then there are those who've wanted to start intramurel teams and can never find other women interested, even though we know that somewhere there are many who are.

These are needs and frustrations we've all felt, here at UMass and at schools when we were younger. The Women's Athletic Council is a union of women, all of us women who feel that such problems need to be dealt with effectively and together.

Spring is coming and with it will be warm weather and plenty of opportunity to get out and do! We women will be running, swimming, playing basketball, softball, tennis, and much more. We will be alone or with friends, but either way we know we are together in our efforts to make strides in our own health, well being, confidence and strength.

The Women's Athletic Council can be a place for us, to organize for a new backstop or start colloqs on women and physical fitness, or to collect material for combating sexism in athletics.

The WAC needs our support in order to gain RSO status. Right now women are meeting weekly on Tues. nights at 7 p.m. in the Northeast pys. ed. building, room 22, downstairs.

There's lots to be done and it's our place to start now! WE CAN — WOMEN IN SPORTS!

Education on the decline

By KEVIN KNOBLOCH
Collegian Staff

> Education makes people easy to lead, but difficult to drive; easy to govern, but impossible to enslave.
> Henry Peter

American education has come a long way since the days of dunce caps and a wet ruler across the wrist. It has progressed in almost a cyclical fashion, from the strict grammar oriented and disciplined classroom of our parents to the new age of permissiveness and "open classroom" we knew while attending grammar school in the '60s.

Today, after what seems like a long and tedious evolutionary period, the classrooms in America seem to have reached a happy medium of rigorous exposure to the three R's with an emphasis on individual creativity.

To reach this medium, our education system has made great strides during the past two decades. The credit for much of this improvement really belongs to the "baby boom" children who crowded the classrooms during the '50s and '60s. An analysis of the situation will reveal why.

Because of the rapidly growing enrollments in public and private elementary and secondary schools during this time, there were considerably more parents. Acting in their best interest as taxpayers, many parents took an active interest in their child's education and in the process often supported new and improved teaching methods.

New and larger buildings were built, corporal punishment was banished from the schoolhouse and the classroom adopted a relaxed atmosphere. Although teachers have never really achieved the proper status they deserve on the professional ladder (teachers are probably somewhere between a bank teller and a taxi driver on the pay scale, despite the incredibly influential role they have in the development of our youth), they indeed improved their image during this period.

This same horde of youngsters born between 1947 and 1960, of which most of us are members, have now reached young adulthood. Even though this baby boom generation, which is responsible for triggering the new emphasis on education, has reached child-bearing age, modern couples are declining to have large families and in many cases, any children at all.

Zero Population Growth, an organization dedicated to stunting the growth of America's numbers, has determined that the average family must have 2.1 children for natural replacement of the population to occur. Blame it on the economy or birth control or working mothers or a combination of these factors, but interestingly enough, the average number of children born to each family for the past few years has hovered around 1.8.

It is obvious what effects this reversed trend is having on school systems throughout the country. Except for a relatively small group of communities located in and around the "sun belt," which has seen increasing population as more families move to the warmer climate, there has been an alarming drop in enrollment in the elementary schools. Between 1970 and 1975, the national enrollment in Grades 1 through 8 decreased by 10 per cent.

The effect has been devastating. Montgomery County in Maryland had 4,500 less students enrolled this year than in 1975-76 and expects to lose another 4,500 pupils this fall. School administrators recently closed seven schools in the county.

Montgomery County is not alone. In Chicopee, Mass. recently more than 100 teachers and administrators received either demotions or dismissal notices in what the School Committee called "an effort to curb rising costs and dropping enrollments."

Beneath all the statistics, a very real danger exists. In the face of declining enrollments, elementary and secondary education could lose the status it has fought so hard to receive.

Couples with no children attending public school may easily forget the importance and need of education for other children and since they will still by paying healthy amounts of dollars in taxes, these couples may no longer be as tolerant of school budgeting and expenditures as before.

Now that their child is not crammed into a stuffy classroom or flunking math, the taxpayer's interest in strong and improving education methods has and will take a back seat to mortgage payments and job hassles.

So, it is inevitable that this newfound neglect of educational institutions will most likely destroy what appears to be a promising trend: smaller student-teacher ratios and increased sums of money spent per student on education. But, we should not allow it to destroy the improvement of the educational process.

To be realistic, faced with drastically declining enrollments, school administrators will continue to trim budgets and cancel teacher contracts. While engaged in such activity, however, strict attention must be paid that the process of "trimming" does not subject the educational process to slow death and the value of education in our society is not placed further down on the priority list.

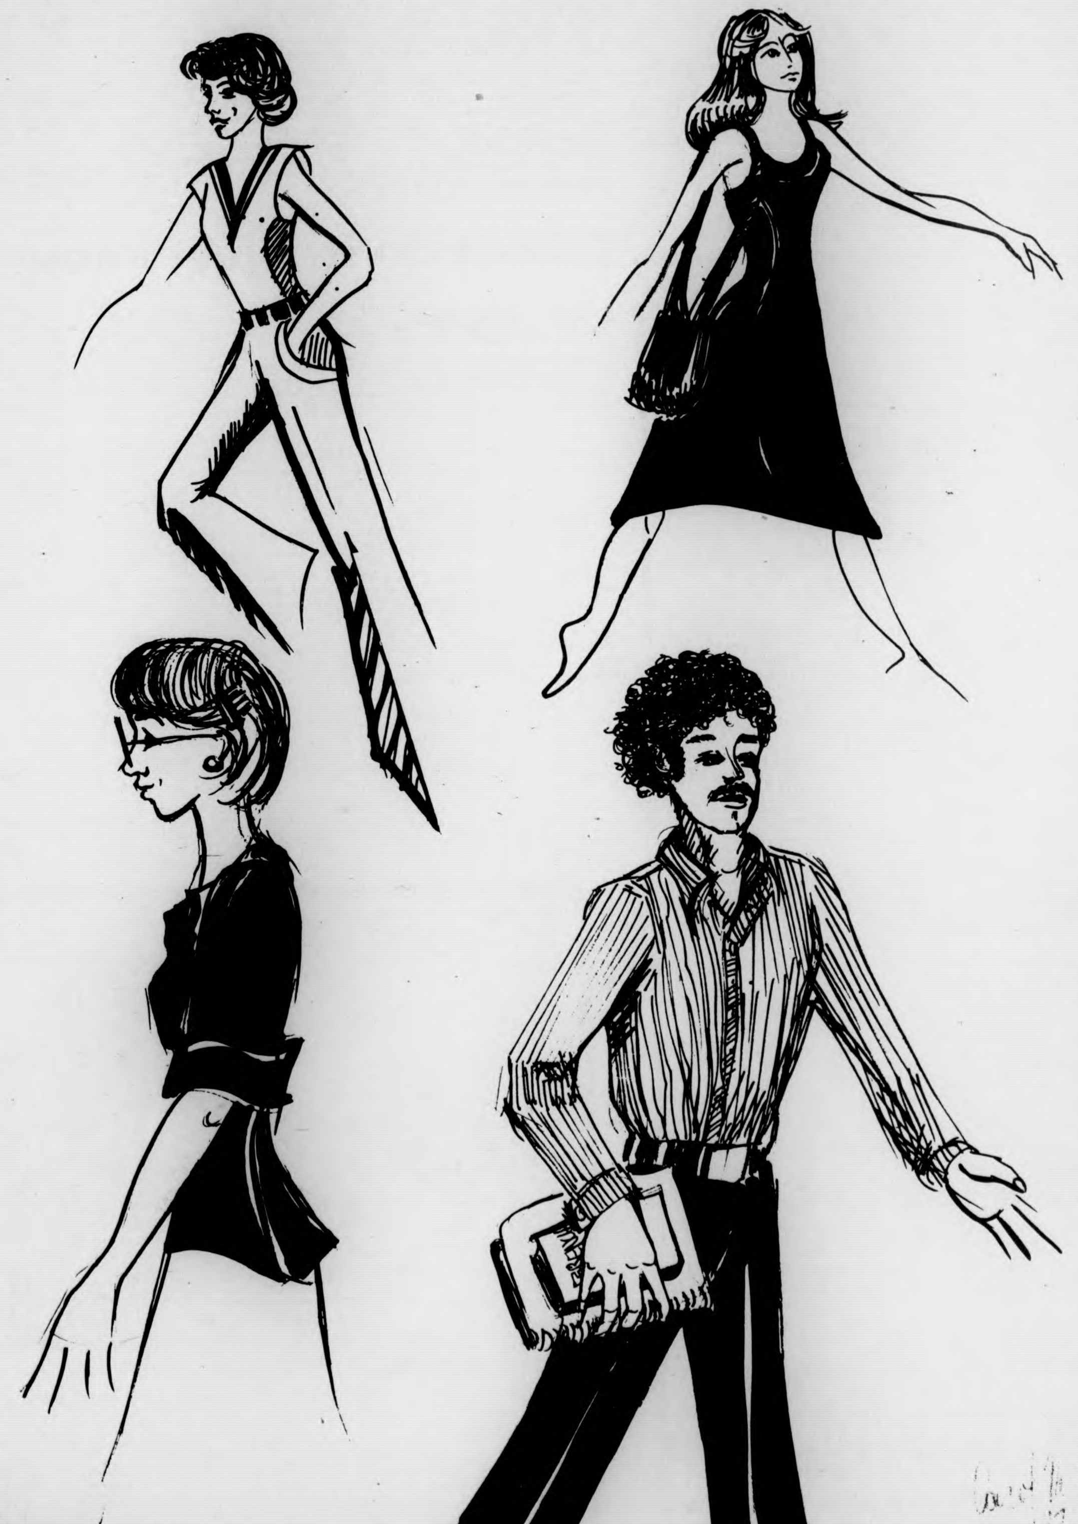
Spring Fashion 1977



Cool, casual, comfortable; the UMass fashion scene

By MELANIE JOHNSON
Collegian Staff

Once upon a time, a student at UMass wouldn't dare venture out of his-her room without checking to see if their shoes were neatly polished, their skirts or pants were at the 'in' length, and that their hair was neatly plastered and curled in place. Needless to say, those days are long gone (many of us let loose a sigh of relief) and the best word that one can use these days regarding both men's and women's fashions is diversity.

Women's fashions have moved away from the mentality that women are meant to dress to please men, to the idea that the way they dress is to please and comfort themselves. Gone are the corsets that pinched in the waists of women in the 19th century (which also had the added "bonus" of cutting off their ability to breathe properly and deforming their organs), gone are the low-necked, wide-skirted, tight-waisted looks of the 40s and 50s; the preoccupation with women's legs and busts have also mostly disappeared. Whether this has to do with the emerging realization by designers that they had been exploiting women, or the fact they just couldn't sell these styles anymore, the looks today are as diverse as the people wearing the clothes.

UMass campus especially brings out this more than anywhere I have been. Students and faculty alike can be found walking around campus, in class, or relaxing outside in a wide variety of pants, jeans, t-shirts, boots, sandals, tunics, skirts, shorts, halters; you name it, someone is wearing it here on campus.

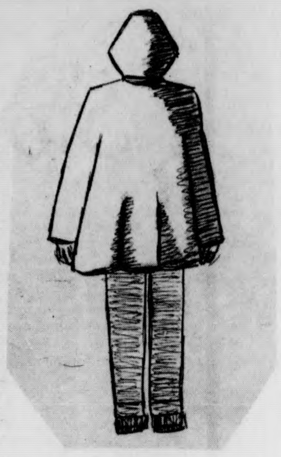
There are a few rules of thumb regarding apparel at UMass. The first requirement is the ownership of at least one pair of blue jeans; these can come in a wide variety of styles and conditions. Witness the faded, patched "barely-holding together" variety, the stiff "just out of the store" variety, the well-worn but "stylish" variety (usually with fancy stitching and wide flares). Some people with a creative flair have embroidered or appliqued their jeans to give them that stamp of uniqueness.

Most students here at UMass also own at least one or two tee-shirts. College shirts are most popular (either from UMass or from friends' schools), but some of the novelty companies have come out with Fonzie tee-shirts, Farrah Fawcett Majors shirts, or shirts from athletic teams. Striped rugby shirts are another variation of this t-shirt phenomena.

The third component of this basic uniform so to speak, is the jacket. For many, it is a hooded sweat-shirt or a nylon windbreaker; in the rain, this campus turns into a sea of yellow rain slickers. Considering the amount of bad weather that we are plagued with in the school year, a jacket is essential to good health. In the winter the variety is more pronounced, as wool coats, lumber jack jackets, ski parkas and down jackets come out of the closets.

Fashion also changes with the circumstance; the Blue Wall brings out the dressier pants and tops, the leisure suits and dresses appear at the Fine Arts Center and at job interviews. Lacrosse games and other athletic events bring out the better sportswear. The dorms often bring out the cut-offs and old shirts (the only way to combat the oppressive heat in those buildings) and the sunny weather brings out the sun-bathing and frisbee-playing gear.

Fashion at UMass is an elusive topic to describe, as it changes with the students who are here each year. In the past couple of years people are a little more inclined to dress up more for classes than they used to; perhaps because the "fashionable" items are more reasonable these days (the demise of the mini-skirt, etc.). By exercising our choice of clothes, rather than listening to the omnisient voice of designers, we can continue to dress in a manner that is both comfortable and attractive; clothes that compliment ourselves, and are not designed to satisfy someone else.



I don't do it, I just know it!

By TYLA L. MICHELOVE
Collegian Staff

The word for fashion this season is comfort. As with spring and summer labels of years past, they are calling California the leader of the sporty look, hence Seventeen, Red Book, and Cosmopolitan, etc., are selling "The California Look".

What this means in real terms is that the fashion experts expect us to be running around in brightly colored satin gym shorts, tank tops and matching satin-acrylic warm-up jackets. This is only day wear, however, so be careful choosing colors. And, it's not for the office, if you have a summer job, it's for the carefree and those who like to look carefree.

T-shirts have also made it big in evening wear, so being casual at a formal affair is no longer a sin. Jumpsuits featuring an elastic bodice and thin straps are appropriate for both day and evening wear. These can be both comfortable and flattering, as well as versatile. They should be chosen in neutral colors so that a varied assortment of accessories can add a different touch for every event.

The skirt and blouse are back in full force, but here is where comfort makes a big impact. The skirt should be a wide flair in a blue, beige or red. The printed top can be a tucked-in t-shirt or a loose short-sleeved cowl neck, or classic madras with or without a "t" underneath.

Helpful hint: To get a real comfortable look with the cowl neck, tuck it in and then pull it out just enough to balloon around your waist. This is also good with regular and high-waisted pants.

Faded denim is more and more the chic thing for day wear, but at night, change into an acrylic, polyester or double knit. This goes for any style; pants, suits, skirts or dresses. If your denim is nicely embroidered, however, or you are wearing a well-tailored jumpsuit, you can get away with denim in the evening.

For an extremely formal event, go with flowing look, or if you are in very good figure, a slinky acrylic will turn appreciative eyes your way. (You have to be very careful with those dresses; they tend to accentuate any flaw in your figure.) It is much safer to wear something layered; solid material close to you, long, of course, with a sheer or lacy fabric covering from the shoulders to the waist, with the choice of more layers as it suits you. The neckline is up to you, as is the line of the dress, though a wide A-line seems to be favored. The idea is to look breezy, fat-free and, of course, comfortable.

Shoes are open-toed or full sandals, both with high heels and both are good for day and evening. Suede sneakers go with more casual fashions, but these are for day wear only. Fryes go back to the closet, but hiking shoes are still OK for jeans, and maybe even the office if casual dress is acceptable.

Just remember that comfort is the key. Wear what you feel good in, what you can move in, with any colors that flatter the most. The styles this season are pretty varied, so you can find what is right for you.

Buy a lot of the same style in different colors, with plans to mix and match. You will develop a personal style and ease the crunch of clothing prices. That should make your season comfortable!

A needle in the right place

...a wardrobe all sewn up

By HEIDI BERENSON
Collegian Staff

Some people think they are fashion plates, and others truly are. UMass junior Randy Glenn projects this image, and has been conscious of his fashion look since high school.

Glenn has been designing and making his own clothes since 10th grade and was 14 years old when he first took up sewing.

He said that he began making his own clothes, not out of interest, but out of necessity. "I was big for my age and always had a problem when it came to buying pants," he commented.

Glenn continued, "I wore a certain waist size, and when I'd try the pants on and get them past the knee, they would get stuck; so I had to buy pants two sizes too big, and take them in at the waist."

At times, he had to buy from the "Tall Men" shops. Glenn said he felt that the clothes looked "tacky", so he tended to shy away from them.

Although Glenn's father used to work for a tailor, and occasionally alterates himself, he said, "My mother is the real seamstress in the family."

He learned sewing from his mother and when he took up sewing in school, he had to be on his own as his teacher was not familiar with sewing boys' clothes.

So Glenn went from taking in his clothes to altering them to get the most wear out of them. This was exemplified through his school attire.

Glenn was on the high school football team, and was required to "dress up" along with the rest of the team for the Friday before each game. Glenn would deceive his peers by wearing the same suit weekly only varying the "look". He would add sequins or different lapels, or shirts, or whatever until he had everyone believing that he wore something different weekly.

Glenn is the second in a family of five, four boys, and the youngest, a girl. None of his brothers took an interest in clothes, but his sister did.

Glenn recalled one instance where his sister was in a sewing class and wanted to make something to set her apart from the other girls. "I made up two patterns for her," he said, and she was very happy with them.

Glenn is always searching to improve his designing techniques, and ability overall. Being a Studio Art major, he was not able to enroll in an Apparel one or two as it is limited to Home Economics majors. So he enrolled in an Advanced Textile Design course, and is now printing his own materials, in addition to making and designing them.

He makes all of his clothes except what he terms, "my knock around clothes," and things he works in. He even makes his bathing suits, and is currently in the process of making a sweatsuit for the spring.

When he used to play junior varsity football for UMass, he along with the team had to dress in a tie and suit for away-games. Of course he made his own suits, and leisure suits for the trips, and when other guys on the team would ask where he got his clothes, he would either say, "In an exclusive men's shop," or "They were tailor made." Through his high style of dress, his teammates gave him the nickname, "Superfly".

Throughout high school and college, when people discovered that he was own tailor, they would kid him about it, but being six feet, and sturdily built, not too many people could really razz him in seriousness.

Glenn knows that there are only a few basic styles that designers build from. He said that with "radical surgery," one can change the appearance of almost any type of garment.

Glenn eventually wants to own his own tailoring store in about 15 years and have his own "fashion showcase." He doesn't want to be rich and famous like Bill Blass, or Givenchy, because, "being famous has its drawbacks; and this would be no big money venture." He continued, "I prefer relative obscurity."

He compared fashion to cars, "It's like cars, you just keep changing the body, but the engine stays the same," he said.

Glenn wants to gear his designs to everyday people. "I either want to design suits for rock groups, and performers, or to middle class people.

He recently designed and made the wedding attire for two friends. He made the bridal gown and the ceremonial tux.

Glenn's flair for clothes and making use of the few outfits he has is exemplified in his philosophy, "People have lots of clothes that are matched for them; I don't have lots of clothes, I just know how to wear them."

Socks......

By MELANIE JOHNSON
Collegian Staff

I have to admit it, but I never really have paid too much attention to new fashions — I've been more inclined to climb into my nearest or cleanest pair of jeans and a shirt or sweater, and that does me for the day. The part of my wardrobe that I pay the strictest attention is my socks.

I guess it started my senior year in high school when my mother kept forgetting that she had already bought me a pair of red socks; by the end of the fall, I had about 5 or 6 pairs of bright red socks. In addition, I had a friend who loved the color purple, and subsequently gave me a pair of purple socks as a gift for Christmas. That was the beginning of the end.

One of my friends in high school documented this phonomenon on my feet when he wrote in my yearbook, "I will never forget waking up to the colors of your socks in Calculus class at 8 a.m. every morning. "I soon accumulated a large assortment of blues, greens, reds and purples, yellow and pink. For graduation I gave a friend a pair of hot pink socks, which, to this day, he rarely will wear, and usually only when he's wearing boots (he tends to prefer the more drab grays, blacks and blues that have been "traditional" foot attire for men).

Since I have come to UMass, my sock collection has grown. I have discovered that many inexpensive retail stores (such as Marshall's, Caldors, Woolcos, etc.) have a wide variety of brightly colored and patterned socks. When once I leaned more toward solid colors, I now own a wide variety of stripes, patterns, checkered, etc.

Probably most infamous in my sock wardrobe is my "Snoopy Collection" which includes a pair of yellow socks with Snoopy and Woodstock dressed as "Beagle Scouts", Snoopy surfing and shouting "Cowabunga" and Snoopy bowling on bright red background. Last but not least is my multi-colored toe socks, a gift from the same friend to whom I gave the pink socks.

Some people think I have some sort of problem because I have such a preoccupation with my feet; actually, I must admit that I do own some more conservative colors and stockings for more formal attire. Perhaps as a "working person" in the "real world" I will adopt more inconspicuous ways of covering my feet. But come over on a Saturday afternoon some time, and I'll show you my newest pair of glen plaid socks with embroidery on the tops. As Peter Pan once said, "I won't grow up!"

and shoes - tying it up bright

While women are becoming more dressed up in the overall fashion picture, emphasis is still concentrated on casual style. The same goes for footwear. The most attention is being directed towards the rope and canvas treatments in shoes this spring. The espardrille look — shown in ankle wraps and leg wrap lacing as well as traditional espardrille — not only stands out in style but is also comfortable.

"This year all kinds of exciting concepts and ideas in footwear are being offered by the Shoe Bin," said Mina Lussier, the owner-manager of the business.

The Shoe Bin on North Pleasant Street in Amherst is one place where women can find the usual and unusual footwear of today.

Sandals are a perfect accessory to the peasant and sun dresses being displayed this season.

Platforms are definitely still "in" — not in closed shoes but in open sandal-type footwear.

Crepe sole sport shoes continue in popularity because of their unsurpassed comfort. Particularly popular are the soft earth tone leathers like tan and rich rust colors.

Clogs are a very important staple in anyone's wardrobe nowadays. Unlimited is the array of color coordinating capabilities in this very stylish yet casual shoe. All colors, all styles — open back, closed back, open toe, smooth leather, and sueded leather — reflect the manner in which this type of shoe can fit into anyone's personality and life-style.

Wood base shoes are playing a very interesting part in this year's fashions. The wood base treatment is shown in all categories of shoes — very high heeled sandals, wood wedges, clog base — and especially a lot with canvas uppers.

Shoes, like the rest of this year's fashions, are varied and comfortable. There's definitely something for everyone!

Kaleidoscope Handprints: Experiment in design

By LISA MASSIMIANO
Collegian Staff

Laura Sicklick and Maria Carito demonstrate their business: silkscreening by hand.

The "American Dream": one can do anything if one tries, cast its dye upon two local artists, who jumped feet first into an ink well and came up silkscreening.

Laura Sicklick and her partner Maria Carito are the proprietors of Kaleidoscope Handprints; a cheery, third floor shop tucked away above the center of Amherst, its corners bulging with stacks of colorful hand silkscreened fabrics and gifts.

Both partners have backgrounds in art and textiles including silkscreening. Laura, an art graduate of UMass and Smith College became involved in silkscreening while in school, and fascinated, chose to develop her interest in design through the art of silkscreening.

"This business was more or less an experiment", Laura said. "Neither one of us had any business experience; we just jumped into it knowing we wanted to design."

Although silkscreening is a relatively common art form, Kaleidoscope is unique in that Laura and Maria do all the silkscreening by hand. According to Laura, silkscreening is an elaborate stencil process where ink passes through area left open on the silk to form a design. Then the fabric must be hung up and dried, and later put through a curing process which sets the ink into the material so the fabric can be washed. "To print five yards of material takes about a half an hour, although, the amount of time varies with different designs," she said. Laura went on to explain: "Making the original drawing on paper is the hardest step, then you have to photograph it and enlarge it. Once the design it put into the screen it is a permanent fixture."

The majority of Kaleidoscope's business is done through wholesale, selling goods to boutiques in New York and Boston, but the shop also sells retail. "Many of our customers are students," Laura explained. "Also, we have a lot of local women who are regular customers."

Laura claims their biggest business is in skirts, bags and aprons. They have twenty women sewing for them, both local women and college students who get paid by the piece. However, the tote bags and duffel bags sold in the shop are designed by a seamstress, then sent to a factory in New Hampshire to be sewn together.

"Some of the designs are more popular than others," Laura said. "It's hard to predict what people will like. Although, having two people designing gives a greater variety of style. Maria and I have a different style, therefore we have both pictoral and geometric designs."

In addition to their shop in Amherst, the two artisans have participated in several craft shows including the Boston Christmas Craft Show, and locally, at the Douglass Auction Galleries in Deerfield, and at Smith College.

The partners claim they enjoy their work and it's turning out to be quite a profitable business. "Designing is something I've always wanted to do," Laura explained. "This is a dream of a lifetime, and we plan on staying in this line of work for a long time."

Topping the whole thing off

By W. ANDREW SUNDSTROM
Collegian Staff

As far as I'm concerned the only aspect of men's fashion worth mentioning is hats. Hats are cool. The best thing about hats is that the more outrageous they are, the more fashionable they are. In a world of faded-jeans conformity, hats are a welcome display of individuality.

Before plunging headlong into the world of hat fashion, I should first mention some considerations for the inexperienced hat buyer. The first is size. Hats must always be tried on before being bought. A hat that is too small leaves an embarrassing mark on your forehead after removal. A hat that is too big is likely to fall off. A further consideration, especially at UMass, is wind. Physicists have determined that the probability of a hat flying off in the breeze is proportional to the cube of the brim area. One solution for wearers of wide-brimmed hats is some sort of neck strap. A word of caution, however — I have witnessed such hat wearers gliding by the library on several occasions. Carry a parachute in case your updraft gives out.

Physicists have determined that the probability of a hat flying off in the breeze is proportional to the cube of the brim area.

These days the unimaginative ski cap is giving way to a whole panorama of springtime headwear. A favorite is the ominpresent (and omipotent, for all I know) "Irish" cap, which can be obtained in just about any color or plaid.

Portuguese fishing hats, and the similar yachting hats, are popular, and small wonder... the Captain himself of the Captain and Tennille wears one.

With the opening of the baseball season, baseball caps are of course also in season. Red Sox caps are blase, Cincinnati Reds caps are a hit. Don't be caught in public sporting a Yankees cap....

For the Hep revolutionary is the classic Mao cap, in navy, black or gray. Even if you aren't a radical you can look like one.

Knit wool hats always manage to survive the winter, and range from bizarre rainbow colossus to subtle, natural statements. While warm weather may bring some suffering to knit hat fiends, they will surely be able to endure with the knowledge that they will stand out in any crowd.

Army caps are forever in style, and coordinate well with faded green argyle socks. In the same vein are construction hard-hats, which serve a functional as well as aesthetic purpose, especially in Southwest or around the library.

Berets are good for the Continental look that is sure to please (whom it will please I couldn't say). But since berets don't shade the eyes much in the sun, you might want to try wearing a visor simultaneously. Visors come in a wide variety of materials: from airy cotton to kinky leather.

Savage BooHoos will require a crushed dirty Panama hat for wasteland binges. A plain silk band with a simple scarlet ibis feather casually inserted is "the balls".

As an addendum I must also note several other popular toppers. Denim train conductor's hats are right on track. Cowboy and farmer hats are definitely organic. And for Sherlock Holmes buffs the fundamental deerstalker is elementary, my dear reader.

Springtime in New England brings color, dressy looks

By LISA MELILLI
Collegian Staff

Well, as the weather gets a bit hotter and we begin to feel that old restlessness called "Spring Fever", we know it's about time to begin looking at what this summer will hold in the line of fashion.

This year's line holds some entirely new looks and some new twists to old looks. This season holds a wide contrast in color: either the softest pastels or the brightest in vivid red, tomato, navy, lemon. No matter what you choose, all are exciting looks for coolness in the summer heat.

Skirts and t's are again big, but the t's have now taken a fancy turn from last year's simple cap sleeve and rounded neckline. Now we have "specialty t's": fancier necklines and different sleeve lengths, intricate designs, also prints now instead of just solids.

Wrap skirts are leading the skirt scene again in gauzy materials, in chalky pastels or in cotton in the newest pattern of the season, madras. Button-up skirts will also be fun with or without the drawstring waistline, another big event in this year's fashion scene.

Drawstring waistlines are biggest in trousers. The big plus for this waistline is its thinning effect. Back big, bigger, biggest are sailor pants hugging a bit below the waist. Again the colors go soft and then vivid in cotton or gauzy, whichever you prefer.

Gauchos make it big again. Summer color continues here, also. Vest, vests, vests ... a discovery made this fall which will be continued in all the summer lines. Mix solid bottoms with striped vests or striped bottoms with a solid vest. Either way, it's a winner.

To complete your casual town and country look, jackets are gathered at the waist, shoe-string tied. Or, they're blazers in double breasted with shiny gold or silver bottoms. Real sharp!

Softness is the word in summer dresses — softer than they have been in a while. Sundresses are the leading number. Perky prints and ginger solids, ruffles and bows, decorated buttons, halter backed, spaghetti-strapped in a "little-girl" looks; real cool looks. The frills continue into other dresses.

Best in dresses are the necklines. The wide turtle look continues. And the special asymmetrical necklines are real catchy. These looks continue into the great looks for gowns. One shoulder saras are still popular in this fashion line. Quianas, to chiffons, to madras, to gauze, to ultima-two are in fabric looks for this summer's dress and gown line.

Jeans are still a big hit ranging from fancy pant style to sailor-type tops to big ten jumpers which appeared two years ago and are still selling strong to fancier dress looks. Prices are soaring and maybe you'd be content to settle for straight-legs!

Bathing suits are indeed interesting for this summer as the interest in one-piece suits continues. One shoulder looks, asymetrical necklines, draw-string waistlines: looks from other articles of clothing now being improvised to create a variety in one-piece suits. Bikinis are of course still a big number — never to die out one can be sure!

Shoes are t-strapped, wooden rope. Skinnier heels are coming back with the more feminine looks elsewhere in summer fashion, but platforms in rope looks as well as wood still continue. The rope look adds a new feature: the rope wrapped around the ankle to the middle calf. Clogs are definitely the biggest and most practical look. Make sure you get the real-ones made in Denmark in order to appreciate the fullest comfort in clogs.

Hair is both long and short. The "Dorothy-do" is still a "do". Longer, suaver looks are coming back on the scene, but a side part is essential for the most current looks in hair fashions.

Make-up is vibrant. Red is the color in lipsticks and blushes. Eyeshadows, whether creamy or powdery, are vibrant and bold. No playing around.

Well, there you have it. The new looks for summer. Have fun shopping or browsing — whichever — I'm sure you'll have fun!

The middle class man on the go

By AMITY HELLCOVE
Collegian Staff

It is becoming clear that prime-time television is having a large impact on men's fashions. More and more you can see life-sized Steve Austin dolls walking the sidewalks. These well-dressed gentlemen will be sporting tailored jumpsuits topping wide-collared, open-necked and brightly printed sport shirts, as well as wearing other forms of leisure suits.

The era of Perma-press has helped men get more involved in the fashion scene. White shirts, easily laundered and cared for by the neighborhood cleaners have disappeared, only to be replaced by colored polyesters and flattering, form-fitting knits. As the shirts have changed, the suit has become more of a device for showing off a nice shirt, than an end in itself.

The look is, either the solid three-piece suit with a solid tie and a printed shirt, the printed tie and a bright, solid colored shirt, or the open shirt with no tie at all. This is appropriate for almost any business function, and casual day and evening social events.

The sporty man has at least one complete tennis outfit, white with blue trim only, and suede sport sneakers to match. He also has a selection of striped rugby shirts to go with his light Perma-press pants. The shirt is tucked in and the outfit is completed with a simple belt and suede sneakers. Rugby striped socks are available and acceptable for long pants only, as the tennis outfit requires white athletic socks with blue trim. Solid colored socks go with the suit and other business wear.

Denim has become more acceptable in the office scene, though combed cotton and faded colors seem to be the thing. These are easily cared for, but require careful attention in ironing as a badly pressed outfit will turn the sporty, active looking man into a slob.

Tight vests and crew-necked sweaters both worn without a jacket, give a well-dressed look with a carefree accent. These can be worn like the suit, with or without the tie. A nice wide collar adds just the touch this kind of fashion asks for. The vest, if you are discarding the suit jacket, should be a solid colored corduroy, light with dark pants of the same color, and dark colors to top light pants.

Before the temperatures go up, heavy Mexican sweaters over turtleneck sweaters and dark corduroy pants are practical and chic. Wear a fancy belt or buckle with this, so that removal of the heavy sweater doesn't leave you looking bland.

When you dress in the morning, keep in mind that action and sports are accented for spring and summer. The leisure suit, easy care polyester permanent press and double-knits are the forerunners in men's fashions for a season developing the image of the man on the go.

The price is right

If there were no game shows I would probably get a lot more done. No game shows and no soap operas, but that's another story. My favorite game show is not a regular one, in fact half the fun is guessing where and when it's going to be. The other half is the star of the show and trying to get on the show with him.

Can you guess what it is? For the matching towels and the car, give it a try. The first clue is, now are you ready, a quote: "I'll get back to you on Monday."

Now you have ten seconds to answer. Oh, just give it a guess. You could be champion if you get this right. No, Mr. Edelstein, it is not Miss Lillian. But you are close. Yes, it is the President and his down home chats, Ms. Johnson. And here are the keys to a brand new political machine.

Mr. Carter has all the excitement of Dialing for Dollars. More maybe, because people believe that his method of getting close to the public, breaking the spell of post-Watergate detachment really works. Hell, the way those cameras really zoom in there, you'd swear he didn't even have secret service men. But it is just television, folks, and the game is all on us.

In Clinton he was friendly and honest (we hope), smiling as he said that he didn't have all the answers and he wasn't familiar yet with what every staff member was doing, but he was going to find out. That is all very well and good. But we really haven't seen Mr. Carter do anything except call that old lady back on Monday and talk to that terrorist on national tv.

He is good, though. I mean, it was a classic idea to get America tuned to the set and moving their dialing finger in patriotic gestures. On tv, it looked like the nation's wounds were healed and that rampant apathy took a dive. But that just isn't so. Nothing has changed yet, nothing changes that fast.

As with his campaign, Carter says a lot of things I agree with, some things I don't, but I am still waiting to see any proof that he is not an old time politician. I refuse to be blinded by gestures, however appropriate they may seem, however new and fresh an approach. I want to see the real thing. I think you do, too.

But we appear to be a nation that wants to believe. We watch tv and read papers, we buy The National Enquirer and the New York Daily News and we believe that what we see is what there is. Nixon knew us, he knew the media and he played us like fools. We would really play ourselves as fools if we continued to accept what we are fed at face value. We should know better by now.

Some of the effects of Carter's media relationship with the country are nice. People can invite the President to their town without feeling the nation's eye staring them down. My town, Lexington, had invited Nixon to be at its Bicentennial celebration and then told Nixon that he would never be welcome in their town. Clinton is not that far away and Carter was welcomed with open arms. It is comforting to see a President respected in his own country. Very nice.

But respect is different from blind faith and we have to be on our collective toes when it comes to a President selling himself to us. We have to wait and see with Carter. Wait and see or lose the game for the last time. Nobody likes losers.

Breakfast at Wilding's

I eat breakfast in the nude these days. There was a time, though, when I would rush downstairs in my jammies, kiss the world good morning, clamor up to the table, and devour my favorite Sunday breakfast — salmon on toast. But the halcyon days of Captain Kangaroo and Mr. Moose have flitted away, vague recollections that have drifted into the dim recesses of a mind looking back on happier times (check out the last half of that sentence — first-class bullshit heh?).

Anyhow I soon learned that salmon was lock-stock full of mercury. Not wishing to have my nervous system gelatinized I turned to scrambled eggs. Then I was warned that the oval lovelies were replete with cholesterol, which was sure to bring on hardening of the arteries and an ugly death at the age of twelve. At wits end I decided on the most innocuous of breakfasts — bacon and orange juice, only to discover that the former was carcinogenic while the latter's acid content could reduce my stomach to custard. And to top it all, last week the boys and Food and Drug determined that pajamas treated with a chemical called Tris were verboten to the American consumer. You see, Tris is also carcinogenic. Out went the jammies, and in came nudity and a breakfast of milk (skim) and granola (all natural).

The life of a conscientious consumer is wearisome and oft times lonely. I have lost most of my friends since I started boycotting spray deodorants. There is a precious layer of ozone up there for which I'm willing to lay down my (under) arms. My younger brothers and sisters all hate me because I confiscated their Easter M&M's. I sifted through for the red-coated ones, looking for red dye number 2. It melts your colon, never mind your hands. Although the packets contained no reds I've hidden them from the kids until the safety of the green, yellow, orange, and brown dies is determined. In the meantime they can chew on sunflower seeds (unsalted).

I was only thwarted in my effort to destroy our radioactive color television. Wielding a jackhammer I stormed the TV room. However the Wide World of Sports was on, so the battle never took place.

My fear of all things harmful reaches back to my breastfeeding days when I would stoutly refuse my mothers DDT'd milk. And that was before Rachel Carson's "Silent Spring". And intuition forewarned me of the botulistic perils of canned food. There was the giant green man telling us to eat canned veggies when all they'd done for him was to screw up his pituitary gland and do quite the job on his skin pigmentation. It wasn't very pretty.

At the age of sixteen, having heard that Corvairs would be recalled because monoxide always managed to sneak in as an extra passenger, I performed my necessary civic duty and totaled the death trap. My gallant act was misinterpreted however and my driving priviledges suspended for six months.

So today as I sit naked before my modest breakfast I look back on my life so far as a conscientious consumer, knowing that the battles that I've fought and won have prepared me for whatever future trials Providence may place in my path of consumerdom. Mind you, I wish to hell someone would turn up the heat.

An arms control agreement needed now, or else...

By MIKE SMOLENS

The Soviet Union last week flatly rejected the dual US SALT II proposals because Soviet officials said the agreement being sought would have benefited only the United States. If SALT negotiations are further stalled, a cooling of detente could prevail and the United States may be forced to develop new weapons systems.

The proposals called for large reductions in the current Soviet arsenal of long-range missiles and bombers while the United States, for the most part, was to limit weapons it has not yet developed. The Soviets felt they were getting the short end of the stick and called foul, especially on the proposed limitation of the US cruise missile and the Soviet Backfire bomber.

The Soviets' new confidence in weapons development also affected their stand on US proposals. Now that they have largely caught up to, and in some areas surpassed, US technological developments, they are not willing to negotiate away their new found strength.

The Carter Administration seems to have grossly miscalculated the Soviet reaction to the US proposals. The Soviets not only rejected the proposals, they did not even offer a pro-Soviet counter proposal — the standard Soviet negotiating technique. Many Moscow observers contend this deviation from the normal negotiating process meant Carter's proposals were way off target.

The US mission to Moscow, led by Secretary of State Cyrus Vance, proposed a ceiling of 1,800 to 2,000 long-range missiles and bombers (including the Backfire) with 1,100 to 1,200 missiles allowed to carry multiple warheads and limits on the range of cruise missiles.

The back up offer was a quick signing of the 1974 Vladivostok accord, which called for a maximum of 2,400 such vehicles, 1,320 of which could carry multiple warheads. This offer included a promise by the United States to deal with the cruise missile-Backfire question in the opening round of SALT III, which would have begun immediately.

The Russians, who possess 2,540 strategic vehicles, said the initial offer was unfair because they would have to make drastic cuts in their forces while the United States, which has a force of 2,130, would face minimal reductions. Also, they refuse to negotiate the Backfire with the cruise missile because they maintain the cruise missile has intercontinental capabilities and the Backfire does not.

The United States argues that although the Soviets have not perfected inflight refueling, it will not be long before they master the technique and, therefore, the Backfire should be considered a strategic weapon.

The Russians also protested that they would be required to limit the Backfire, which already has been deployed, while the United States would be limiting the not yet fully developed cruise missile.

The Russians rejected the back up offer because they want limits on the cruise missile before further agreements.

The Russians were angered by the publicity the US proposals received in a press conference held by Carter prior to negotiations. The publicity put them on the defensive and pressured them for an agreement.

They were equally upset that their only knowledge of the proposals came from Carter's press conference. In previous years, former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger made a practice of sending items for negotiations ahead of him, giving the Russians time to think them over.

If SALT negotiations fail between Vance and Soviet Foreign Minister Andrei A. Gromyko at Geneva in May, some strategists predict a cold war confrontation reminiscent of the Kennedy-Khruschev era.

The two superpowers have already sent each other obstinant criticisms. Carter's vow to "hang tough" with the Russians has unified Congress, but has won him no friends in Moscow. His stand on human rights, while not the impetus of the Soviet SALT rejection, certainly did not soften up the Russians.

The Soviet Union, on the other hand, has sent Khruschev-like warnings on human rights and SALT proposals. Also, the Soviets say they may no longer tolerate US air and submarine bases in Europe.

All of this may force the US to swing into full production of new weapons systems. The newest is the MX mobile missile, which is currently under development. The mobility of the MX will present problems for the Russians because they will be uncertain of the missile's exact location. The MX, able to carry about 15 warheads, will be more accurate than the Minuteman III which makes up the brunt of the current US land-base missile system.

The Pentagon has already recommended production for 150 B1 bombers, which would be combined with improved B52s to make up the US strategic bomber force. The low-flying B1 would be used against heavily defended Soviet targets, while the B52, used as a cruise missile carrier, would attack lightly defended targets.

The Trident submarine, which, like the B1, is at the production stage, will be equipped with two versions of Trident missiles: one with a range of 4,600 miles and one with a 6,000 mile range able to carry several warheads.

The final superweapon, of course, is the cruise missile. The cruise missile is a low-flying, pilotless aircraft that would carry either conventional or nuclear warheads to enemy targets. The missile, susceptible to advanced Soviet defense missiles, would not be used against heavily defended targets.

It would be in the best interest of both the United States and the Soviet Union to reach an agreement on arms control. The two superpowers may have needed this brash confrontation to feel each other out; if so, future negotiations should run smoother. However, if a SALT II agreement cannot be reached, we can look forward to, as one Government official quoted by the New York Times put it, "a real chill for quite a while."

ERA opponents warned against political manipulation

NEW YORK (UPI) — The National Organization for Women yesterday charged opponents of the Equal Rights Amendment are using the issue to build right-wing political opposition to busing, gun control and minority hiring.

Charging the Stop-ERA forces are not "just a group of frightened housewives," Mary Jean Tully, president of NOW's Legal Defense and Education Fund, said the amendment is being used as "bait" to lure thousands into a major right-wing political machine.

"This is major nationwide political force," Ms. Tully said at a news conference called to "reveal" that the allies of conservative commentator Phyllis Schlafly, a leader of Stop ERA, are opposed to busing, welfare, gun control and affirmative action.

"We think there is much more at stake than the Equal Rights Amendment," said Ms. Tully, who cited a NOW-commissioned report by a freelance "investigative reporter" that indicates Mrs. Schlafly and others are using the ERA issue as "bait to bring people in and politicize them."

Ms. Tully said Mrs. Schlafly has joined with "national ultra-conservative political organizations for whom the Stop-ERA movement helps with organizing and fund-raising on other issues as diverse as busing, postcard voter registration, child abuse laws, regional government, right to work laws and even Rhodesian chrome."

Mrs. Schlafly, reached in Tallahassee, Fla., for comment, called the NOW statements "nonsense."

She said, "Well, I think that's all very funny. Stop ERA works to defeat the Equal Rights Amendment. We work solely for that.

"I'm sure a lot of our members are interested in other issues. Sure, so am I. So what?" she said. "To attempt to categorize Stop ERA people as one particular group is simply not in accord with the facts.

Killens to speak on Russian poet

John O. Killens, novelist, playwright, screenwriter, and lecturer, will speak in Campus Center 163 today at 7 p.m. His subject will be "Alexander Pushkin: Black Root of Russian Revolutionary Literature."

Pushkin, the subject of Killens' new novel, was a black Russian who, according to Killens, was "the first people's poet of Russia," and "the father of Russian literature." Yet, it appears that Pushkin's influence on the giants of Russian literature — Turgenev, Tolstoy, and Doestoevsky — is almost unknown to the literate American, as is the fact that Pushkin was the inspiration for the first attempt at revolution in Russian history nearly a hundred years before the October revolution of 1917.

'Moonies' released from parental custody

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) — Lawyers for the Rev. Sun Myung Moon's Unification Church won at least temporary freedom yesterday for two young members who kept the faith after 2½ weeks in their parents' custody.

A three-judge panel of the California Court of Appeal put a temporary halt to an earlier ruling that had given the parents 30-day custody of John Hovard, 23, and Janice Kaplan, 24.

"This means the young adults can go wherever they want to and do whatever they want," church attorney Ralph Baker said after the proceedings.

But it was only a partial victory for the church, which already has lost three of the "faithful five" named in a conservatorship ruling March 24. Conservatorship is a form of custody normally applied to persons unable to handle their affairs because of physical or mental infirmity.

Barbara Underwood, 25, Jacqueline Katz, 21, and Leslie Brown, 24, announced earlier that they had decided to leave the church after talking with deprogrammers, professionals who are trained to persuade Moonies and other cult members to renounce their beliefs.

The five had been turned over to their parents by Superior Court Judge S. Lee Vavuris after a 12-day hearing. Vavuris ruled that the five were "subject to deception of artful and designing persons."

Immediately after Monday's ruling, attorneys had to break up a shoving match between Miss Kaplan's mother, Beatrice Kaplan of Toledo, Ohio, and church member Bethie Rubinstein.

"I only wanted to say hello," Miss Rubenstein said later. "Janice was my best friend."

Miss Kaplan and her mother went off with church attorney Jerome Falk after the decision and were not available for comment.

Young Hovard said he would "probably" return to the church.

Hovard's parents, John and Gail Hovard of Danville, Calif., waited tensely in a hallway for a word with their son after he finished talking with reporters. They refused to comment on the appeals court decision.

WHAT'S HAPPENING

'Toward Tomorrow' tapes presented

The Toward Tomorrow Fair, held in June 1976, examined a variety of alternative life-styles and future social possibilities. Most students were away at the time so the Student Video Project has prepared a series of tapes which highlights this celebration of America's third-century.

Two tapes will be shown this week which were edited by graduate student John Furbish.

Both tapes will be shown on today and tomorrow in the Video-Sidewalk display on the Campus Center Concourse. Tonight at 7:30 p.m. in the Student Union Commuter Collective Lounge, the feminist tape will be shown, followed by a discussion at 8:30 p.m. Both tapes will be shown, on Wednesday evening outside the Undergraduate Student Senate meeting in Campus Center 101.

Minnesota Orchestra to perform at FAC

The Minnesota Orchestra will perform at the Fine Arts Center (FAC) on April 19 at 8 p.m. and not today as reported in yesterday's Collegian. Tickets for the concert are now on sale at the FAC box office and all Ticketron outlets.

The Anthropology dept. film series will present two films tonight: a short piece on "Archaeology in the Lab," and the full-length feature "Pather Panchali".

"Pather Panchali" is the first part of the well-known "Apu Trilogy" which made Indian director Satyajit Ray famous among cinema-lovers around the world. "Pather Panchali" is about life in rural Bengal and is a classic of sensitive and realistic film-making. These two films will be shown at 8 p.m. in Thompson 102, free.

The next in the anthropology department Tuesday evening film series will be April 26; "The Pride and the Shame" about the contemporary situation of the Sioux, and "Report from China," a documentary made in 1973.

College Republicans to meet tomorrow

The UMass College Republican Club will discuss plans for the future tomorrow at 7 p.m. in Campus Center 177. Many ideas, including a Republican Symposium, will be discussed. Members of the Republican community and interested independents are invited. Disenchanted Democrats are also welcome.

Racism lecture delivered

Prof. Hattie Fox will deliver a lecture entitled: "Racism in History" and a percussion and audiovisual workshop at Van Meter today at 7:30 p.m.

Fox, a psychologist and historian, was educated at San Diego and UCLA. She founded the Neo Presearch Energy Foundation based in the South Bronx.

Fox is a brilliant percussionist who can play six or more timbales together. She has performed with Don Cherry and Ornette Coleman and has recorded with Archie Shepp. She has her own female jazz group.

Afro-Am soloists to perform today

The Department of Music and Dance will present six soloists from the class in Techniques in Afro-American Vocal Music in recital today at 4:30 p.m. in the Phillip Bezanson Recital Hall (Room 248) of the Fine Arts Center.

Soloists participating in this recital are Eleanor Mish, Holly Hartman, Richard Anderson, Mary McNulty, Lynn Walker and Barbara Dordick. A variety of song styles will be presented including the jazz jump tune, the ballad and blues. The singers will be accompanied by a trio of piano, bass guitar and drums.

Lasting for only one hour, the rectial is open to the public without charge.

Video Sidewalk presents musicians

The Student Video Project will feature artists such as Janis Joplin and John Lennon on this week's Video Sidewalk. Join us this and every Tuesday in the Campus Center Concourse and in the back of the Hatch on Wednesdays 11:30 a.m.-2:30 p.m.

Title IX hearing; Special Programs

There will be a Title IX open hearing tomorrow from noon to 2 p.m. for Special Programs, which includes Area Studies, Bilingual Collegiate Program, BDIC, CCEBS, Communication Skills Center, Everywoman's Center, Global Survival, Honors, International Programs, Legal Studies, CIRI, Upward Bound, Internships, Orchard Hill and Southwest courses and colloquia, Project 10-Inquiry, Rhetoric, UMW, and Women's Studies. The meeting will be in Campus Center 165.

All staff and students are welcome and encouraged to come, bring their lunch, and discuss their concerns or experiences regarding sexual discrimination within these programs, as well as to share their views regarding the status of women without them.

Anyone wishing to submit written statements may do so at the hearing, or, if unable to attend, may send them to Ann Thompson, Provost's Office, Whitmore.

YOUR BIRTHDAY

by Stella Wilder

Tuesday, April 12 — Born today, you are a warm-hearted, generous person who is always the first to offer aid, whether of a material or spiritual nature, when others are in difficulty. At the same time, you have a personality that inspires others to come to your rescue -- whether you need rescuing or not! You may often find yourself in the position of refusing help from those who mean perfectly well but who have mistaken your need. Generally speaking, you are quite capable of taking care of yourself -- bodily, emotionally, spiritually, mentally. Highly independent, you have no desire to allow yourself to be "taken over" by anyone, no matter how much grief he or she intends to spare you in the process.

Although you are often called upon to give advice, you do not really enjoy doing so. You prefer to help others by pitching in with your hands and heft rather than by telling them what they should or should not do. You do, however, take the time and trouble necessary to think through carefully those problems put to you for pondering. You never try to fool others into thinking you have done your best with their problems if you have not; you prefer to hand them back unattended and unsolved rather than to take the chance of landing their owner in water hotter than that they are already in.

You are a great seeker after the views of others. You like to know what another would do in your position -- not because you wish to change your own mind about the matter, but because you take such pleasure from the bolstering you gain from others when they do agree with you. Not one to be deprived of your own opinion, you will stick to what you believe through even the greatest of trials.

Wednesday, April 6

ARIES (March 21-April 19) — A time of difficulty early in the day may require considerable patience and even more tact to weather intact.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) — The right track to success and happiness is the one that brings you to conclusions about your own character. Know yourself!

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) — Well-placed confidence makes it a simple matter for you to succeed in a number of areas today. A colleague takes over difficult chores.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) — Refuse to play favorites, regardless of the incentives offered you. Another's efforts to sabotage your work come to light today.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) — Ignoring your problem may not make it go away; it may, however, buy you the time you need to prepare for handling the situation effectively.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) — More demands may be made upon your time today than you anticipated. You would be wise to send only men on errands meant for men.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) — If you can justify disappointing those who believe in you, then your conscience will be clear. Otherwise, prepare for a distraught evening.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) — Personal magnetism does much to gain you your ends today. Don't mistake magnetism for talent, however; cultivate the latter.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) — This would be an excellent time to drum up new suoport for an old project. Be sure of your facts when you present them.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) — Many show confidence in your good judgment today; don't disappoint them. Be sure to utilize all your strengths in the interest of success.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) — Recent activities are not to be covered up. The wise Aquarius will admit his unsavory involvements and go on from there.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) — You have a reputation for being one to be counted on in a pinch. Live up to that reputation today. Keep your emotions in check in afternoon and evening.

Robinson doing OK

PITTSBURGH (UPI) — If the first three games of the season are any indication, the Pittsburgh Pirates may find themselves choosing a substitute as their most valuable player for the second straight year.

Bill Robinson, last year's MVP and winner of the Roberto Clemente Award given by area baseball writers, so far leads the Pirates in RBIs with six, is tied for the lead in stolen bases with two, is second in batting with a .400 average, and is tied for second in runs scored with two and in hits with four.

Yet Robinson has no position to call his own. In the first three games he pinchhit once and started twice in place of ailing leftfielder Al Oliver.

It's the same story as last season, in which Robinson batted .303, tied for the team lead in home runs and finished fourth in RBIs while shuttling among the roles of pinchhitter, third baseman, first baseman and leftfielder, rightfielder and centerfielder.

And Robinson admits he finds ironic the fact he has been performing better than the regulars.

However, he said Monday, "that's the way baseball goes. You keep your mouth shut and when you're needed to play, you go out and do the best you can do."

Also, he might have added, in between you work to improve yourself as much as possible.

Robinson, nearly 34, appears to be in much better shape than many of the younger players. During a workout Monday, he was out there in a rubber suit trying to sweat off a few ounces on his lean body. Then, figuring he might get a call to fill in for Willie Stargell, who strained a knee Sunday, he began fielding grounders at first base.

That wasn't how Robinson felt a few weeks ago after the Pirates made a last-minute deal to bring Phil Garner here from Oakland to replace Richie Hebner at third base. Robinson had been the leading candidate all through spring training to take over third base, and news of the deal left him crushed.

Robinson spent long hours by phone talking to his father and friends and eventually came up with a philosophy that saw him through his disappointment.

"I use this philosophy: It's not my life, it's not my wife, so why should I worry," he said.

It could be worse, he said. Instead of being a substitute drawing a regular salary, he could have been waived. Instead of playing near his home town of McKeesport, Pa., he could be across the continent. Instead of being with a team he feels is a contender, he could be playing for one destined for the cellar in its division.

Robinson now is able to find good in his earlier disappointment.

"I just look at it as though it makes me a better person, because I did more to get myself in shape this winter and spring than I ever did before," he said. "And that's only going to enhance me this year as a player."

Lucchesi might file charges

ARLINGTON, Tex. (UPI) — Texas Rangers Manager Frank Lucchesi, still suffering severe back pains from the beating administered last month by Lenny Randle, said Monday he was not going to rush to a decision on whether he would file a criminal complaint.

"I've been thinking about what will be best for me, my family and for baseball. And I've been thinking about what will prevent this from happening to any other manager."

Randle, disgruntled because his second base job had been given to rookie Bump Wills and further upset because Lucchesi had referred to him as a "punk," beat Lucchesi into submission March 28 in Orlando, Fla.

Randle was suspended for a month by the Rangers and although he has since apologized to Lucchesi and the club, the Texas manager has refused to accept the apology.

"There's no time schedule on my decision. I've got two years to decide," Lucchesi said, referring to the statute of limitations on an assault charge.

The blackness surrounding the manager's right eye is fading slowly, but he still is plagued by a painful back.

"I took a lot of punches in my back when I was down," he said.

UMass nine goes 'pro'

By JUDY VAN HANDLE
Collegian Staff

During baseball's spring training, the usual games between major league teams were played. But if you were a careful observant of the grapefruit (or, for that matter, cactus) league scenes, you may have noticed some strange scores slipping in now and then.

Teams from colleges such as Arizona State, USC, and Florida were playing the big leaguers. And, not only playing them, but beating them in some cases, too.

Tomorrow at Earl Lorden Field, the UMass baseball team will get its chance to take on a professional baseball outfit. Although the opponent won't be a major league franchise, it would well contain many players who will one day be playing in places like Fenway Park or Yankee Stadium.

The Minutemen will be hosting the Eastern League Holyoke Millers at 2:00.

The Millers are the newly-enfranchised Berkshire Brewers of the Double-A league. Their parent club is the Milwaukee Brewers.

For many years, the Holyoke-Springfield area had been interested in obtaining a minor league franchise. The Pittsfield entry in the Eastern League had played several regular season games in Holyoke over the past few years, and had drawn reasonably well. But the area did not have the proper facility to house a team, so despite poor attendance in the Berkshires, the team did not move.

After the 1976 season, though, the Brewers were forced to relocate. Wahconah Park, their Pittsfield stomping grounds, is undergoing a facelife which will take two years. As a result, the franchise was without a home.

Enter Holyoke. Mackenzie Field, which was built by the WPA during the depression, was available for use, and after some bickering back and forth, it was decided that Holyoke, indeed, would be the home of Milwaukee's Double-A franchise.

But what of the Millers, the team which will be taking on the Minutemen. Just who are they?

For the most part, Holyoke is a team of youngsters who are either just out of college or who are working their way up from the A leagues in an attempt to one day reach the majors. Only one player on the squad has had major league experience, and that for only a September trial.

According to Millers' general manager Tom Kayser, Holyoke's infield is fairly set. The first baseman is Gary Holle, who has been the most impressive hitter in spring training thus far. A product of Siena College, Holle led the New York-Penn League in seven different offensive categories last year, including home runs and RBIs.

Garry Pyka, out of the University of Texas, is slated to hold down second base. He was with Berkshire for a half season last year.

Ed Romero, a "slick fielder," according to Kayser, is a 19-year-old shortstop who last year led his league in games played while with single-A Burlington.

Third base should be held down by Neil Rasmussen, a holdover from the 1976 Brewers. He hit .252 last season.

The catching job is a tossup between another Texas players, Ron Jacobs, and John Buffamoyer. Jacobs batted .333 for Newark of the NY-Penn league last year before being promoted to Berkshire, while Buffamoyer is reputed to be a good defensive backstop.

Four outfielders are in the running for starting berths. Newcomer (from the Detroit organization) Ike Blessitt is one, while Jeff Yurak, also a new face, came over the San Francisco chain. A good hitter, he batted .293 with 57 RBIs for Cedar Rapids last year.

Gary LaRocque, out of the University of Hartford, hit .281 with 27 steals for Burlington last season. But perhaps the brightest prospect is Bill Severns, who prompted Kayser to say, "we're surprised he's back." Severns hit .281 with 22 extra base hits and 10 steals last season.

Pitching, which has been a trouble spot for the Millers this spring, is headed up by the Brewers' brightest hurling prospect, 6'6" Rick O'Keeffe. The only man with major league experience, Lafayette Currence (love that name) split 1976 between Spokane and Berkshire, and compiled a 7-8 record. He pitched for Milwaukee at the tail end of the 1975 season.

"Pitching is our biggest question mark," Kayser admitted.

Four players from last year's Brewers made it to the majors this season, including Eastern League Triple Crown winner Dan Thomas.

Managed by former St. John's infielder Matt Galante, Holyoke opens its season Friday. The first home game is slated for a week from Sunday against Waterbury.

Meanwhile, Mackenzie Field is being refurbished, ready to greet the area's first minor league team since the Springfield Giants left town in the early 1960's. Meanwhile, the UMass baseball team will provide the first northern opposition to the 1977 Holyoke Millers.

Poloists lose to CCNY

In an incomplete finish to a good weekend of water polo, the UMass men's team lost to City College of New York, 5-2, to come in second in a six-team tournament held this weekend at Boyden.

On Saturday the UMass "A" team had won two qualifying games by large margins. In the first game of the day, the poloists defeated BU 18-1. The scoring was well distributed, with Duncan Lomas leading the way with five goals and three assists, Russ Yarworth with three goals and one assist, Bob Corb with one goal, three assists, Rick Mansfield with one goal, two assists, Ben Crooker with two goals, two assists, Henry Maclean with three goals and an assist, Tom McGinn with three goals and an assist, and Jim McIver with a goal and an assist. Goalie Rick Notini made 11 stops while allowing just one goal.

The "A" team's second game was against a more experienced Trinity College team, but the results were much the same. UMass won 13-3. UMass played one of its strongest games this year and completely dominated a team which had given the poloists difficulty in the fall.

Once again the scoring was well distributed with four players scoring three goals. Lomas (1 assist), Yarworth (2 assists), Corb (2 assists), and Mansfield (1 assist) all scored the "hat trick" while McGinn added the last tally. Rick Notini had another strong game in goal and had an assist on one goal.

The "B" team was not having such good luck. In their first game of the day, the "B" team lost to the eventual tourney champs, City, 13-6. Scoring for the "B" team were Matt Snow (2), Stu Carlisle (1), Matt Weeks (1), John Gallagher (1), and Dave Young with one. Special note must be made of the fine defensive work of Dave Young and goalie Bill Tharion who had 13 saves against the good shooters of City. In their second game the poloists lost to MIT, 13-1. Stu Carlisle scored the lone goal for UMass.

Sunday, the "A" team met City for the tourney championship. The first period was a close defensive struggle with UMass coming out on the short end of a 1-0 score. The second period got more physical with UMass attempting to swim away from its slower more control-oriented opponents. The results were frustrating as the half ended with UMass trailing 3-1.

The second half was equally frustrating as the poloists could only add one more goal while City scored two. Duncan Lomas scored both goals for UMass.

Bosox face Chisox

CHICAGO (UPI) — Strangely, President Bill Veeck had "no announcement" Monday when his Chicago White Sox worked out in balmy weather in preparation for Tuesday's home opener against the Boston Red Sox.

Veeck's nonannouncement, though, almost constituted an announcement.

The fences in Comiskey Park's vast outfield will not be moved in, he said.

In order to change the dimensions of a playing field the modification must be completed prior to the beginning of the regular season. So Veeck's decision not to change the fences hung on new manager Bob Lemon.

"I think our pitchers need the fences the way they are more than our hitters need them moved in," Lemon said.

So Veeck left the centerfield fence 445 feet from home plate, the foul lines in both right and left field at 352 feet and the distance in the right and left field power alleys at 375 feet.

There had been suggestions earlier that Veeck would reinstall the low barrier which cut the distance in centerfield to 400 feet.

The weather forecast was favorable with the temperature expected to hit 75 degrees under a warm sun.

THE WUJS INSTITUTE
Here's a way for college graduates to experience Israel in a comprehensive one-year study/work programme. You spend your first 5 months in Arad, a dynamic new town, together with other graduates from all over the world. There you will study Hebrew, Judaica and Israeli society, combined with tours and a kibbutz period. For the following 7 months or more, you can either work in your profession, volunteer in a kibbutz or development town, re-train professionally or continue studying. The World Union of Jewish Students Institute in Arad could be the beginning of your love affair with Israel.

Horsehiders face Eagles— and four more

By JOHN LOWNEY
Collegian Staff

The UMass baseball team begins a diverse schedule of five games in five days, as it travels to Chestnut Hill this afternoon to face Boston College in a 3:00 game.

After battling the Eagles the Minutemen return to Earl Lorden Field tomorrow afternoon to duel with the Holyoke Millers, the Milwaukee Brewers' AA Eastern League affiliate.

A Thursday single game at Springfield college followed by a doubleheader at New Hampshire Saturday, top off a typically busy week of baseball for the Minutemen.

The great amount of games places emphasis on depth, particularly pitching depth. With the usual cold weather, injuries such as sore arms and pulled muscles, combined with some unexpected ailments, have especially hurt the Minutemen this spring.

Coach Dick Bergquist commented, "I don't want to make any alibis for this weekend, because we played lousy, but the injuries have slowed us down so far."

The injuries to some key players have forced Bergquist make last minute alterations in his lineup. For example, Jeff Reardon was expected to pitch one of the Northeastern games, but a strained rib cartilage injury precipitated Tom Nigro's insertion into the lineup.

If he is sufficiently recovered as expected, Reardon will throw against BC today. Another hard-throwing right hander, Doug Welenc, who has been suffering from a lower back ailment, should be ready to pitch a few innings Thursday.

Another regular who has seen little action since returning from Florida is senior first baseman Dale Stone. The lefthander is now strong after a troublesome upper leg muscle pull, and will start if BC throws a righthander.

With Stone at first base, Mike McEvilly, who has been the team's most consistent run producer, will move to an outfield position.

John Czerapowicz, whose sore arm has prevented him from playing catcher, but whose bat has kept him in the lineup, may also see some action in the outfield.

Whoever plays against BC, the Minutemen cannot expect to handle the Eagles as easily as they did in last year's 15-3 rout. BC coach Eddie Pellagrini called that game one of the worst he's even seen in twenty years at BC.

Pellagrini, who played major league ball with the Red Sox, Browns, Reds, Phillies, and Pirates, rates his infield as the strongest position of the experienced BC squad.

All-New England third baseman Tom Songin, who was widely recruited for hockey and baseball, leads the Eagle attack. The Walpole native blasted 11 homers as a freshman to set a BC record.

First baseman Jim Conroy, from West Roxbury, led BC in hitting last season with a .454 average. Woburn second baseman Kevin McDonald and Lynnfield shortstop Bob Santilli give the Eagles a solid double play combination.

Pellagrini also has great confidence in his pitching staff, which is largely made up of Massachusetts natives. Hard-throwing Ron Luongo from Everett leads the staff, but Lexington's George Ravanis, South Boston's Bill Paulsen and Seekonk's John Murphy provide more experience.

BC did not have the advantage of a Southern trip and has had several games cancelled already. Despite it's lack of games this season, BC is a proven team. The Eagles' depth and experience should provide UMass with a stiff test.

Nuggets enjoy bye

DENVER (UPI) — The Denver Nuggets begin their first National Basketball Association playoffs April 20 against the winner of this week's Portland-Chicago preliminary playoff.

The best two-of-three series between the Trail Blazers and the Bulls opens Tuesday in Portland, goes to Chicago Friday and concludes Sunday in Portland if the third game is necessary.

The Nuggets finished their first NBA season at 50-32, tied with the Philadelphia 76ers for the league's second best mark behind the Los Angeles Lakers.

The Houston Rockets, 49-33, join the Nuggets, Lakers and 76ers with first-round playoff byes as Denver Coach Larry Brown will give his club three days off before beginning playoff preparations Thursday at the Air Force Academy.

"We just want to go away for a while," said Brown. "We need to get our minds completely on basketball, and I think the camp will help us get in a mental frame of mind that will be so important in the playoffs."

The team will report Wednesday evening and will practice at the Academy Thursday through Sunday. An off-day is scheduled for next Monday with a practice at McNichols Arena April 19.

One of the problems the Nuggets had during the regular season was winning on the road where Denver had a 14-27 mark, compared to a 36-5 record at home.

"We have found so many ways to lose games on the road, especially the close ones," Brown said. "We have to find ways to win those games and cut down on our mistakes."

The Nuggets will have the home court edge in all playoff matches, except against Los Angeles and the 76ers.

Bruins blast LA, 8-3

BOSTON (UPI) — Bobby Schmautz scored three first period goals last night in pacing the Boston Bruins to a runaway 8-3 victory over the Los Angeles Kings in the first game of their Stanley Cup quarter-finals series.

Boston, which defeated Los Angeles in last year's quarter-final series, hosts the Kings again Wednesday night in the second game of the series.

The Bruins, who won their final five regular season games, blew open the contest with three goals in a 3:01 span early in the first period. Brad Park and Gregg Sheppard also scored in the first period to give the Bruins a 5-0 lead.

Don Kozak and Vic Venasky scored second period goals for Los Angeles, sandwiched around Terry O'Reilly's tally for Boston. Stan Jonathan and Matti Hagman scored third period goals for Boston while Dave Hutchison tallied for the Kings in the third period.

The Bruins were penalized a total of 25 minutes while the Kings spent just eight minutes in the penalty box. Included in Boston's penalties was a five minute fighting major and a gross misconduct violation assessed to Mike Milbury for pulling the hair of LA's Kozak during an aborted fight.

Schmautz opened the scoring 1:49 into the game, potting a rebound of a Jean Ratelle shot. Park slid a 40-footer past Rogie Vachon 56 seconds later and Schmautz scored from a deep angle at 4:50 of the first period.

A message for Michael

Remember when you told people in high school you were going to UMass? Your know-all friends' smiling "ZooGrass — get ready for some heavy partying" would be matched by a contemptuous teacher's skeptical "I hope you'll be able to study there."

Now that you're a full fledged UMie you hear budget cuts, massive layoffs and elimination of entire programs. No matter how much you protest, you'll see Mike Dukakis smiling, saying what a great school we have here and then ripping the place apart.

Your joking high school friends, the cynical high school teacher and Governor Dukakis are all perpetuators of the UMass inferiority complex.

Another cause of the inferiority complex is the UMass athletic program. An array of enigmatic teams have represented the university in recent years. The best here have managed to surprise even the most pessimistic fans.

The football program probably suffers the most from this identity crisis. Can UMass compete on the level of a Boston College or is it just another Division II school with 23,000 students?

The '75 team tore through its schedule of teams like UConn, Rhode Island and Western Illinois. The Boston papers even gave UMass some press. Then the Minutemen traveled to New Hampshire to wrap up the Yankee Conference and bang, 14-11 loss and end of bowl hopes.

The Minutemen returned many of '75's starters last season, including the top offensive weapons. UMass would definitely be recognized with a more competitive schedule. Surely enough, the season was a dud, topped off by another resounding defeat to UNH.

Everyone knows the exploits of the basketball team. In '75 UMass raced to the Yankee Conference title, only to be bypassed for the regional playoffs. Years of budget cuts would not produce the protest caused by the famed UMass "snub".

Just to show New England fans they were for real, the Minutemen proceeded to roll over everyone in '76, including such "powers" as Boston College and Providence College. The Boston press recognized them. Bob Ryan even wrote a column about them. Then a 25-foot Joey Whelton bomb ended the UMass season with a thud.

Like the football team, the hoopsters began the '77 season with a deep, experienced combine. They were in the new Eastern Independent Basketball League, so the media would have to notice. The media certainly noticed, especially after losses to Penn State, Niagara and New Hampshire.

The Minutemen had another chance in the playoffs, however. But who would bet on UMass defeating Rutgers for the second straight time? An unbelievable story! Then they lost to a Duquesne team they had already beaten by 13 points.

Not to be outdone, the women's basketball team scrambled for its best season ever, although the Minutewomen lost to weaker teams like Maine and Rhode Island. They went into the regional tournament as favorites and then lost to Springfield, a team they had twice beaten by 20-point margins.

Now we have the '77 baseball team. It lost six games in Florida, but defeated nationally-ranked powers Miami and Southern Illinois. The Minutemen then lose to Division III Southeastern Mass. and then defeat it 13-0 and 10-2. They clobber Northeastern, 8-0 and then lose a doubleheader to it.

It's no wonder that the Boston sportswriters either ignore, criticize or laugh at the UMass teams. Their job is to make some sense of the crazy sports world, and UMass makes their job a farce.

It's also no wonder that it is impossible to raise alumni money for a new arena. Those distinguished graduates whose only connection with the school is through the UMass box scores would never donate their hard-earned dollars for a team which beats Rutgers but loses to UNH.

The sports program is not the most important part of a university, but it is a potential source of revenue, and what does this school need more?

Is there really a UMass inferiority complex? Is it so deeply engrained as to make the Massachusetts sports uniform a jinx? Does Mike Dukakis really think this university can survive his proposed budget cuts?

Carter shortens Liddy's term

WASHINGTON [UPI] — President Carter yesterday muted the sentence of G. Gordon Liddy, the enigmatic mastermind of the Watergate burglary whose bungled breakin led to the toppling of Richard Nixon.

Liddy, who will be eligible for parole July 9, will have served just over four years of a sentence six years, eight months to 20 years for the June 17, 1972, burglary of Democratic National Committee headquarters in the Watergate complex.

Deputy Press Secretary Rex Cranum said that he believed "it's doubtful" that Carter would take similar action regarding others convicted in Watergate, including former Attorney General John Mitchell and top Nixon White House aides H.R. Haldeman and John D. Ehrlichman.

Granum said Carter "took this action in the interest of equity and fairness based on a comparison of Mr. Liddy's sentence with those of all others convicted in Watergate-related prosecutions."

Mitchell, Haldeman and Ehrlichman all received maximum sentences of eight years in the Watergate coverup, and are likely to serve only a fraction of that. Only Ehrlichman has gone to prison; the others have appealed their convictions.

G. Gordon Liddy

Liddy has served more time in jail than any other Watergate figure.

The last of the original seven Watergate burglars behind bars, Liddy also was sentenced to three years in jail for leading the White House "plumbers" into the office of Dr. Lewis Fielding, the psychiatrist for Dr. Daniel Ellsberg, and 18 months for contempt for refusing to testify before a grand jury.

All the other Watergate characters — from Liddy's Cuban-American co-burglars right up to Nixon — told their story in one way or another. But Liddy kept what he considered a code of honor and remained silent.

This angered Judge John Sirica, who gave Liddy a longer term than his fellow burglars, and refused earlier to commute his sentence to time served.

Others who gave testimony in court and before the Senate Watergate Committee told bizarre tales about Liddy.

He was the mastermind of the conspiracy who shredded $100 bills to cover his tracks and plotted to supply call girls to delegates at the Democratic National Convention.

He went to Mitchell with a $1 million plan for "dirty tricks" against Nixon's opponents and enemies. The plan later was scaled down to $250,000 and the Watergate cover-up trial jury concluded Mitchell approved the Liddy plan.

The mustachioed former FBI agent, who had become counsel for the Nixon re-election committee, proposed wiretapping, surveillance and photographing documents — all crimes uncovered in the Watergate inquiry. His more bizarre proposals — abducting radical demonstrators who might disrupt the GOP convention and the call girls for Democrats — apparently were not carried out.

Carter signed the order at 11 a.m. on recommendation of Attorney General Griffin Bell. Liddy had petitioned for commutation on Sept. 6, 1976, but President Gerald Ford did not act.

White House counsel Robert Lipshutz met Feb. 11 with Mrs. Liddy, her Boston attorney, George Higgens, and James Gavin, chairman of the Liddy Neighborhood Committee seeking his release.

Granum said the White House role in the process was "very limited" and that the Justice Department had been reviewing the case. He said the White House informed Liddy of the decision through his attorney.

GradSen exec slams plan

This is the fourth in a series of articles examining University programs and majors that stand to be affected by the provost's five-year plan. The provost sent his plan to deans and directors on March 24 and has asked them to respond by April 15.

By JOE QUINLAN
Collegian Staff

Graduate Student Senate (GSS) President Michael Federow yesterday criticized the provost's five-year reallocation plan for reflecting nationwide market demands for career-oriented training. Federow said the University should still provide students a diverse liberal arts education needed for "a diverse society."

Associate Provost David C. Bischoff, also the dean of the school of Physical Education, defended the provost plan, saying there may be a "misunderstanding" of its intentions.

Bischoff said the shifting of resources from liberal arts into the professional schools for a short term is to implement "budgetary flexibility" at UMass, so the administration will be able to meet future needs "wherever they are."

Bischoff also noted the provost is under a time pressure to produce a long-range plan. He said he felt the provost had all the necessary data to propose his reallocation plans. According to Bischoff, budget outlines for each school were submitted to the provost "a while ago."

"They (deans) had a chance to make the best case they could," said Bischoff. He went on to say the plan probably did come out on "a very short time line with a very

Associates remember Mrs. DuBois

By ANGELA THOMAS
Collegian Staff

"She was the epitome of love," said Chancellor Randolph W. Bromery. "One had the feeling of awe when in her presence. She represented the history of black struggle," said Chester Davis, Associate Chairman of the Afro-American Studies Department.

These comments were made about Dr. Shirley Graham DuBois, writer, teacher, and a scholar in her own right, who recently died in Peking of cancer.

DuBois was the wife of the late Dr. W.E.B. DuBois, the famous co-founder of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, (NAACP) and controversial civil rights advocate.

A very close personal friend of DuBois, Bromery and his family first met her in Cairo, Egypt. It was at this meeting in 1970 that their deep friendship was formed and sealed. In a telephone interview about DuBois, Bromery remarked, "The relationship never got any deeper between us, for it was instant."

Bromery's own mother passed away some years ago, and while he and DuBois never related to each other as mother and son, they nevertheless had a deep mutual love and respect for each other. Bromery noted, "If I were able to choose someone as my mother, I would be proud in having her."

Davis met DuBois in the late 1940's, at the University of Chicago, where she was a guest speaker. Even then, Davis remarked, she was a very strong advocate and worker for the black struggle. Davis said DuBois worked in, "total dedication to the black struggle."

As a Distinguished Visiting Lecturer in the W.E.B. DuBois Department of Afro-American Studies, which in honor and memory of her husband bears his name, DuBois spent two years teaching at UMass. In 1973, she chose to place her husband's manuscripts, the DuBois Papers, at the University. The papers deal with the consulting work of Dr. W.E.B. DuBois. Most of the DuBois Papers are at UMass, while the remainder are in Cairo, Egypt.

A former resident of Cairo, Egypt, DuBois was very much in demand as a lecturer. She visited the Peoples' Republic of China in 1974, and as their guest, celebrated

'80 per cent of rapes go unreported'

By LISA MASSIMIANO
Collegian Staff

"Every nine minutes a rape is reported in the United States, and advocates say as many as 80 per cent of rapes go unreported," said Molly O'Neil, coordinator of the discussion on "Rape and its Definition," the second in a series of workshops held at Hampshire College this week.

O'Neil read the standard definition of rape from Webster's Dictionary, and went on to discuss the need to change society's accepted definition of the act of rape.

"According to the dictionary definition rape is realized as a despoiling of property, therefore objectifying women, viewing them as property rather than human beings," she said.

O'Neil pointed out that rape has been seen as acceptable behavior throughout time. "Women are taught that there is a certain beauty in rape, a fascination in the act of struggle and submission."

Emphasized in the discussion was the concept that rape is not a series of situations and events, but set ways of being. "Rape affects how woman view themselves. If you are not raped there is always the fear that you will be raped, and women are controlled by that fear. Rape is part of an institution that is oppressing women," O'Neil said.

"Rape is not the few cases that go to the police station, rapes we hear about are only the exceptional ones, most rapes are quiet ones," she said.

At the end of the presentation O'Neil asked the group of women participating in the workshop to discuss how the ideas of power and rape shape our lives and how we may redefine these concepts.

"I think we should extend the definition to include 'mental rape', the use of verbal comments made to women on the street," said one woman.

"A situation which often arises is one where a woman becomes afraid and convinces herself that she is being paranoid. We have to change this thinking, so that women don't ignore fear, but recognize it," added another participant.

"Action should be taken to tell men that it's no longer permissible to rape women. I think we should start dealing with the problem on a collective basis rather than an individual, personal basis," said O'Neil.

Convention off for lack of quorum

By LARRY COHEN
Collegian Staff

The Southwest Constitutional Convention was postponed last night because there were not enough house delegates to form a quorum.

The convention, which will amend Southwest's constitutional election procedures to comply with a recent ruling by student Attorney General Paul Yanowitch, was rescheduled for next Tuesday night at 7:30 in Hampden Student Center.

According to convention rules, a majority of Southwest's 25 residential houses must send delegates to the convention. Only ten delegates showed up last night.

At the regular Southwest Assembly (SWA) meeting last night, President Chris Durkin announced there are still places left on the election committee for interested Southwest students. The elections will be held Thursday, April 21, in Hampshire dining commons from 9 a.m. to 6:30 p.m., and in Berkshire dining commons from 10:30 a.m. to 7 p.m. Nomination papers were made available last Thursday, and are due in the Southwest Office in Hampden Student Center on Friday, April 15.

The postponement of the Constitutional Convention last night will not affect the scheduled Southwest elections in any way, said Durkin.

In other business last night, the SWA voted to allocate $209.13 to John F. Kennedy lower tower for a Dorm Unity Week to be held May 1-8. The week will feature a coffeehouse, a dorm picnic, softball game, movies, and many workshops and presentations.

Also last night, the SWA passed a motion urging the administration ban smoking in all classrooms while classes are in session, in public rooms at public events, and in all elevators. The motion also urges the administration to restrict smoking to limited places in the dining commons and other eating places on campus.

The SWA also passed a motion which endorses the opposition to the elimination of any academic programs by the Provost, a requirement that all assemblypersons write their legislators about the dangerous effects of level-funding at UMass, and that assemblypersons urge their constituents to write their legislators.

In final business last night, the SWA voted to grant the Executive Committee fiscal and policy-making power from May 11 through the first meeting of next semester.

Harris thrills crowd as 'Belle of Amherst'

By KEVIN TURCOTTE
Below the Salt Staff

I'm Nobody! Who are you?

Emily Dickinson could have been writing those words straight for Julie Harris, who played Emily Dickinson in "The Belle of Amherst", a play directed by Charles Nelson Reilly at the Fine Arts Center (FAC) April 7. You see, Julie Harris was a real nobody at that performance.

That's right. A nobody.

THEATRE REVIEW

Nobody but nobody could have entertained and enthralled the audience as Julie Harris did last week.

Nobody could have held an audience singlehandedly with as much wit and charm as did Harris.

Nobody could have played the role with as much exuberance, energy and poetry as did Harris.

Nobody but Nobody, finally, could have supplied Harris with as much humor, sentiment, insight and "phosphoresence" as did Emily Dickinson herself, through her poetry and letters, which the play was literally transcribed from.

Julie Harris as Emily Dickinson

I'm Nobody! Who are you?
Are you — Nobody — Too?
Then there's a pair of us?

The play, presented as a monologue over two hours in length, weaves the story of Emily Dickinson and her life here in Amherst.

Dickinson spent most of her life as a recluse in her downtown Amherst home, dressing solely in "bridal white" and generally mystifying most of the townspeople by such behavior.

As Emily said: "The soul selects her own society — then shuts the door."

"I never had to go anywhere to find my paradise.... I found it right here."

"People find it hard to believe I had a normal childhood."

The play also related Dickinson's attempts to get her poetry published. Dickinson, who wrote 1775 poems in her life, had only seven published while she was living, and those were published anonymously.

After years of rejection slips from The Atlantic Monthly, she concluded that "publication is the auction of the mind of man."

"The Belle of Amherst" was more than a play, it was like a personal poetry reading from America's foremost poetess.

"If I feel the top of my head were taken off — that's poetry," said Dickinson.

Well, after last Thursday's performance I feel as if the top of my head were taken off — that's a good play.

with the Chinese Government and people the 25th anniversary of the Republic. Before moving to Cairo, Egypt in 1966, DuBois and her husband had lived in Ghana, West Africa where she was founder and first director of the national television of that country.

While at UMass, DuBois taught creative writing. Her first book, a biography of George Washington Carver, was published in 1944, when she was 37. She wrote children's books that told of the contributions that blacks have made to the development of America. Since 1937, she wrote many other biographies, novels, short stories, poems and plays.

DuBois was born on a farm in Indianapolis, Indiana on November 11, 1907, the daughter of the Rev. David A. Graham, a Methodist minister, and his wife, the former Etta Bell. The family moved almost yearly to different places across the country, where as a youth, DuBois spent time in New Orleans, Spokane, and Colorado Springs.

She met her husband in Colorado Springs when she was 13 years old. They were married in 1951. He was 83, she was 43.

In her distinguished career, DuBois served many years as an educator. She was head of the Fine Arts department at Tennessee State College, and a professor of music at Morgan State College, from 1936-38 she was director of the Negro Repertory of the Chicago Federal Theatre. She worked as a field secretary for the NAACP, served as the founding editor of Freedomways magazine from 1960-63, and as English editor of the Afro-Asian Writers Journal of Peking in 1968.

Her books have been translated in over forty languages and have won numerous awards. They include works on the lives of Paul Robeson, George Washington Carver, and Phyliss Wheatley. Her biography of Frederick Douglass, There Once Was A Slave, took the Messner-Lionel Judah Tachna Award for the best book combating intolerance in America in 1947. It was translated and published in Moscow and Peking in 1959 and a pocket-book edition was put out by the United States Navy. In 1950 the work was set in braille by the United States Army.

Van Meter S. study complete

By ARNOLD WARSHAW
Collegian Staff

The Van Meter South Study Group has completed its analysis of the problems that caused tension in the dormitory and yesterday released a report which makes recommendations for possible solutions.

The four-member group spoke with dorm residents, Head of Residence (HR) Elizabeth Williams and Central-Orchard Hill area staff.

"We learned that many communications difficulties existed in Van Meter South," the report stated. "We listened to conflicting versions of many incidents over the first semester, we looked at what kinds of communications were apparent in the whole social system, and we asked what had happened."

The group found that one cause of tension was a "major breakdown in communication" that occurred early last fall.

The communication problem between Williams and her Resident Assistants (RA) resulted in one RA being fired, one resigning last semester, and three resigning this semester.

In one specific incident, an RA brought a pet into the dormitory. Williams told the RA there was a formal no-pet policy in effect and that she as an RA should set an example by adhering to it. The RA would not remove the pet.

Williams fired the RA and "they (students on the floor) appeared to feel that the HR was wrong in taking such a strong stand on the pet policy," the report stated.

The report suggested all the persons involved in this incident should clarify both formal and informal rules and come to a mutual agreement on what rules are implemented.

Another communication problem involved "an informal network of rumor-spreading and indirect attacks on personalities," according to the report.

The report recommended that a "rumor clinic" be set up so rumors can be checked out and facts can be set straight.

"The report states "The HR in Van Meter South appears not to have built good communication with her RA's when she first had them together as a group in the fall.

"She did not communicate enough personal interest in them as individuals," it said.

The group also recommended that Williams and the RA's could do a better job if their job roles were better defined. The group also found racism to be a problem in Van Meter South.

Specifically, the group stated "There is an uneducated use of the word 'racism' in describing the problem situations. Also, according to the report, "The apparent feeling and resentment of some dorm residents that the Head of Residence had a special comradery with other Third World residents and staff members."

The group suggested that to alleviate these problems, there should be an RA trained especially in dealing with racism and sexism, that all RA's be specially trained in areas of social oppression and that classes and colloquia in racism be set up in Van Meter South.

Title IX explained

Sex bias here investigated

By CAROLE BRENNAN
Collegian Staff

Title IX, as mandated by the 1972 Educational Amendments, prohibits sex discrimination in federally funded educational institutions.

According to Bertha Auten, the affirmative action co-ordinator in the Provost's office, by July this University will compile a single report describing all areas where sex discrimination is said to exist on the University of Massachusetts-Amherst campus.

The process leading up to this report, which will be available to the Department of Health, Education and Welfare (HEW) any time after July 1, is currently underway.

Each Major Budgetary Unit (MBU) within the University (i.e. colleges and schools, personnel, administrative, finance and student affairs) has organized a Title IX Committee.

These committees have been asked by HEW to hold at least one open hearing to collect information on sex discrimination in their respective areas, said Patricia Asack, an affirmative action co-ordinator in administrative areas.

One of the goals of each committee is to make the meetings "as public as possible," said Asack. The committees are looking for comment.

Auten explained that every committee in an academic area has been appointed by the dean of the particular school it is working out of. The Title IX committees are made up of faculty, students and staff.

One member from each of the individual committees sits on the Provost's Title IX Review Committee. This committee is made up of eleven people, nine of whom are women.

The process which the final report will evolve from, explained Auten, begins with the open meetings held by the individual MBU Committees.

The committees, said Auten, will listen to charges of sex discrimination with regards to policies and practices. They will not, however, deal with charges of discrimination on a one to one individual basis. Complaints such as these will be referred elsewhere, she said.

Once the individual committees, most of which will take comment outside of the hearings, either written or verbal, have compiled their reports, they will be given to their respective deans. After offering any comment the dean sees necessary, he will then forward the report to the Provost's overall review committee.

In conjunction with the Chancellor's affirmative action co-ordinators, of which there are five, the Provost's Committee will then arrive at a point where a singular document to be kept on record for three years will tell the story.

Auten contends that the Title IX Committees have already begun to reap profits. She said there is a new conscious raising on the part of University women.

"This is not necessarily something that will be completed in a week or even in half a generation," said Auten, "but I think in a full generation it will be completely turned around."

Asack said responsible actions geared towards decreasing sex discrimination in this University will begin right away in any area where it is possible to do so.

By getting ahead of the situation, Asack said her aim as an affirmative action co-ordinator is to be "pro-active, rather than re-active."

Eugene Britt, the Provost's Review Committee appointee from the College of Food and Natural Resources Title IX Committee, has held two open hearings in his area.

Since the first was poorly attended, he explained, the second one was planned. That one also had only a few people on the classified staff in attendance.

Britt said he did receive a prepared statement from clerical employes in the College of Food and Natural Resources.

The statement read, "Most of the instances and incidents of discrimination brought out here are University-wide problems. Most are not specific; they set a tone where clerical workers are discriminated against by the nature of their work." The document, which included recommendations for the problems, was signed by nine women in the department.

As for students in the College of Food and Natural Resources, Britt said, "No piece of paper from any graduate student voicing any major concern was received."

Britt, who not only is sitting on the Title IX Committee but has also been the College's affirmative action officer for about two years, said he fears what will happen when the Title IX Committees are disbanded.

Senate to hear towing proposal

By JOE MAGLITTA
and RICHARD LaFAUCI
Collegian Staff

Getting your car towed next semester may mean a cheaper fee and a shorter walk.

Roger Sturgis, coordinator of the Committee to Stop Amherst Towing, said he will submit a proposal for a student run towing service to the Undergraduate Student Senate next week. The senate has rejected similar proposals for the last two years. Sturgis said there was a "good chance" the proposal would pass the senate.

"Student run towing is a very good possibility by August 1, or by January 1 if the contract with Amherst Towing cannot be broken," Sturgis said.

Sturgis said he will also present to the senate a petition to ban Amherst Towing from campus and create a student towing service. The petition has been signed by 6,500 students, he said.

Student Government Association (SGA) Co-President Jon Hite said he didn't think the proposal would get through the senate because of lack of funding.

"I'm sorry we can't get the towing, I think Amherst Towing is a ripoff. The problem is that we wouldn't be able to maintain our present level of services if we had to fund such a service. It will boil down to this or paying professional's salaries on campus," Hite said.

Sturgis's proposal calls for an initial outlay of $29,000 to cover the cost of two tow trucks, an office trailer, and fencing for Lot 31, planned site of the garage.

Sturgis said student towing would cost $13 per tow with a storage charge of $1 per day. Amherst Towing charges $15 for towing and a $3 per day storage fee. Also, the service would create at least 15 student jobs.

Any profits from student towing would be funnelled back into the SGA.

"We are paying a great deal of money, $170,000 over the last two years, to an independent business that is contributing nothing back to the University," Sturgis said.

Amherst Towing, responsible for all towing on campus, is appealing a recent decision by the Department of Public Utilities (DPU) ruling their $15 towing fee illegal. Amherst Towing rates are the same as they were before the DPU ruling.

Amherst Towing refused to comment last night. "We don't want to get involved with the Collegian," a spokesperson said.

Jim Starr of the Legal Services Office said he is investigating the treatment students are receiving before the University Traffic Appeal Board. The board, comprised of faculty and students, is the only avenue of appeal for students who feel they have been wrongly ticketed or towed.

"We want to make sure students are receiving due process," he said.

DVP presents psychiatrist

By MELANIE JOHNSON
Collegian Staff

Joy Marcus, a radical psychiatrist from the Berkeley Institute of Radical Psychiatry will speak in Mahar Auditorium, Thursday, April 14 at 8 p.m. in a 2-day program sponsored by the Distinguished Visitors Program.

Marcus has a strong background in community health, radical psychiatry, and therapy. She received her basic training in radical psychiatry from Claude Steiner at University of California, Berkeley, and since has been active in several California health services as consultant, trainer for rap center volunteers, organizing psychiatric day-care programs and conducting therapy groups.

Marcus was a founding organizer of the Berkeley Radical Psychiatry Center, where she conducted weekly therapy groups, and acted as primary liason between the Berkeley Community and the Radical Psychiatry Center. She also organized the first annual Radical Psychiatry Conference.

Marcus currently maintains a private practice and trains and supervises persons in the San Francisco Radical Psychiatry Collective.

Marcus was also the founding organizer and editor of Issues in Radical Therapy, a quarterly publication, and has written articles in a variety of psychiatric books and poetry anthologies.

In December 1973, Marcus organized a coalition of feminist therapists to protest sexist practices at Esalen Institute in San Francisco. She has also produced and hosted a bi-weekly radio show at KPFA titled "Radical Approaches to Psychiatry."

Marcus' lecture will be followed by a coffee hour in Campus Center 162 at 10 p.m. Friday April 15. Marcus will conduct a series of workshops from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m.; more information about these wrrkshops will be available at the lecture.

A case for the magic Boob!

Black Affairs

Being from New York is a special kind of privilege, as any native will attest to. It's a smart town, a stylish town, a sporting town. The best of everything is there. It's the world's pacesetter, and although the game of basketball was invented in Springfield, it's played best in New York. Also to be from New York is to have played some or watched some of the most superlative basketball ever, just about anywhere you find a court, a ball, and some enthusiastic participants.

Alex Eldridge, Derick Claiborne, and Mike Pyatt are all select imports from The Apple and represent perhaps the best 1-2-3 combination in UMass basketball history... proportionately the savvy and sheer class these players bring to the floor transcends what may be a lackluster team at best into a finely engineered bomb; to paraphrase a shopworn cliche, "on any given night..."

These players like many of their illustrious predecessors such as Connie Hawkins, Pablo Robinson, Kareem Abdul Jabbar, Nate Archibald, Charlie Scott, Julius Erving, and Al Skinner along with countless others who have somehow cultivated the traditional elements of the game with a open flambuoyance and uninhibited style much like the great Charlie Parker did with music they have developed a totally different "feel" for the game, where on the asphalt courts of the city the game meets its severest test under the critical examination of the world's most sophisticated fans. Another such "extrasensory perceptive" phenomenon has arrived in the person of Alex Eldridge, affectionately known to us as "Boob".

A floor General

In this writer's humble opinion "Boob" is indeed the team's lifeblood, a rare gift in the eyes of his contemporaries. A natural leader he possesses all of the intuitive instincts it takes to play sound, winning basketball with a potential of blowing any game wide open. He's a take-charge type player with spellbinding defensive kills and outstanding passing ability; he will invaribly set the tone of the game when on the floor, whether its administering sparkling bits of brilliance to the cat-quick acrobatics of Claiborne, or the velvet touch of pure-shooting Pyatt, or the slam dunk tenacity of Town and Donaghue... he's an unselfish player whose assist column is staggering coupled with unbelieveable defensive play along with a finely calculated approach to offense; he knows each spot on the floor as well as Muhammed Ali knows his boxing ring... in total command at all times Boob dramatically dictates the game.

This and more is the case for Alex Eldridge.

A Political Enigma

Alex's playing style knows no boundaries, this man is not merely exceptional, he's unpredictable. The Boob's city flair may be a bit too much to take along with that special magic he goes about the court with, as some even accuse him of being down-right tempermental. This maverick tendency has cast him as a political enigma of sorts within the UMass athletic department where his assured, outspoken manner has characterized him as a dissident right on down to his distincitive playing shoes. Notwithstanding the ever-ploitive "Give 'em one for the Gipper" routine, Alex and coach haven't been exactly bashful about expressing their different points of view. A kind of detente had to be agreed upon by the two for the sake of avoiding a possible riot at the infamous Cage and Boob has since gone about the business of leading his team unperturbed. This way everyone's happier, because everyone knows that Boob has the stuff without which the Minutemen would be happening for precisely that... a minute, and soon find themselves sailing close to the wind of mediocrity.

To some extent this position represents revolutionary power quite unfamiliar to the straight-laced conformity of New England, and subsequently attracted its due amount of controversy gingerly defined as "dialogue problems" with head coach Jack Leaman, a man who gets paid to see to it that problems are alleviated not created.

Championship Duet

Categorically, I know of no other coach who is more of a no-nonsense task master than the brilliant Donald Adams of William H. Taft High School in the Bronx, himself a product of the New York streets having played with and coached some of the greatest players this planet will ever see. Coach Adams understands his players and respects their abilities, but as any who have played for him will tell you he's a relentless mentor who emphasizes the explosive running game and the good, tight "D"... the same brand of play depicted by Eldridge and Claiborne, a devestating backcourt combination that took Adams' heralded "Blue Devils" on to win consecutive New York City Public School Championship in 1974 and 1975.

Adams has been considered one of the premier coaches in high school ball today. He has worked with inner city youth even before the time it became fashionable to do so, and has gained the respect and admiration of all who know him. Due to his diligent efforts we can savor the magnificent exploits of Claiborne and Eldridge right here in little old Amherst.

Excellent Supporting Cast

The other cast of New York characters follow suit in their unique brand of play. Derick Claiborne, an astounding player in many respects is the most consistent cog in the wheel. Although Derick stands at only 6'1" he plays with the abandonment of 6'10"; an extremely poised player he can rise to the old proverbial occasion with excellent shooting range and uncanny body control and moves to the basket that would stun the imagination. Claiborne, nicknamed "Frank Nitty" undoubtedly for the menacing tactics he displays on the floor as well as that iceberg decorum he projects, brings a quiet, yet demonstrative leadership quality to the team. If there is a soul to this team this tommy gun shooting bandit more than adequately fits the bill. He is a contained player with an extraordinary flair for the avant-garde; a free-spirited, yet even-tempered player who seldom gets ruffled. His pesky defense is outmatched only by his slashing, shake and bake type of offense; he can score with the best of 'em.

Claiborne may be considered the most underrated player on this team although he displays sterling skills and outstanding courage on the floor. It can be said that he doesn't do any one thing great, it's just that he can do most things very well; a rock-steady player and among his teammates an inspiration.

Mike Pyatt is the best natural forward to come along Route No. 9 since Dr. Julius Erving, and I might add even before then. He can leap with anyone, anytime (occasionally jumping center at just about 6'5"). He possesses a fluid rhythm and amazingly quick hands; his favorite shot, a soft, lofting Oscar Robinson-type one-hander that on a given night is like taking yours to Ft. Knox; he's accurate to say the least. "Py" is gifted with that same city slickness which enables him to appear untouchable in spots. Pound for pound and inch for inch you won't find a better pure shooting forward in this part of the country. "Py" is the most potent offensive weapon in the UMass arsenal.

Coming off the bench to fill an occasional gap has been New York's Brad Johnson and Billy Morrison; both outstanding prospects for the future have UMass fans licking their chops in anticipation. They are both capable and enthusiastic competitors whose background and skills lend themselves to the razzle dazzle style that has been fashioned by "The Boob."

Proof of the Pudding

And yet there was for me a great mystery surrounding the UMass basketball program and the key question raised is: What's spiritually wrong with the team? Anyone who even vaguely follows basketball here at UMass knows most everything is "alright" with the team, that a little more aggressiveness and a few more rebounds wouldn't cure. The caliber of this team is solid, and on occasion even brilliant.

While I sat and watched a game against Rhode Island, as Mike Pyatt lay grimacing in pain with a torn hip muscle, I was appalled to notice that not one coach came off the UMass bench to personally assess the degree of injury to such a key player as "Py"... and although the appreciative throng at Curry Hicks Cage gave Pyatt a standing ovation upon his painful exit, it was nevertheless a horrendously shabby gesture on the part of the UMass coaching staff to appear so detached... then suddenly it came to me. Amidst all of the previous allegations of insensitivity, discrimination, and promoting general discord it then became strikingly clear... what the real problem with the team IS.

In my years playing, coaching, and watching the game from the Pee Wee leagues on the side streets of Harlem to the showcase Madison Square Garden, I have never witnessed such flagrant disregard for an injured team member by a coach; it was thoroughly unprofessional and tasteless. Unfortunately I will never be considered a die-hard Umie loyalist, however I could not help feeling embarrassed and hurt by the absolute thoughtlessness of Mr. Leaman and his staff.

It may be too much to expect from a coach who has had little in the way of true champion charisma, although Leaman is among the country's winningest coaches with an impressive 177-81 record for a .686 percentage (same as Digger Phelps of Notre Dame) which places him at 17th out of the 30 current top NCAA coaches; nonetheless his handling of player's is extremely questionable. While the Minutemen frequently exhibit shades of individual greatness, Leaman has not properly harnessed this team's full potential as a unit.

Player's today are more mature and require different kinds of treatments. Players, in order to be champions, must develop an unquestionable respect for their coach... a "fear of God" relationship that must be tempered with total commitment to generate an atmosphere of mutual openess, support, and trust. The coach must create "espir de corps" among his troops, before he can expect to bring home his bacon. It's simple hard-nose techniques work for some people and not so for others. Sensitive human insight and flexibility are essential keys to successful coaching, the capacity for change plays an integral part in determining whether the team develops their own unique formula for winning games.

Defensive skills in basketball today are still overshadowed by the point-producing displays of the offense, and after all points win games. However unlike perfecting an accurate jump shot, which can be done in one's own solitude, the development of sound "D" can only come from actual game experience. There are few skills which can encourage good hands, anticipation, reflexes and insight into the sheer physics of the game.

Some share the view that defense is the name of the game, citing it's more of a thinking man's game to anticipate what an opponent's attack will be and beat him to it. And it certainly stands to reason that a good defensive play conjures up that mythical revelation of "The Tortoise and The Hare"— triumph over devastating odds. The style of play depicts the working class modality of the American economic mainstream in general. It's the hard, unglamorous, and often-time unrewarding side of the game, and takes a special breed to cultivate into flourishing productivity.

It can also be said that to be a good defensive player is to be exceptionally offensive-minded in the first place.

And though the Boob's point average is not exactly eyecatching his "whirling durvish" offensive leadership are unmistakably acts of pure genius which defy anatomy and gravity. He can mesmerize the total offensive flow.

New York, a state which has produced the most college basketball All-Americans, is the natural hotbed of round ball activity.

The South Bronx is a tough place to come up, always has been. Much of the tenement dwellings have been devastated by arson and ravaged by vandalism where high incidences of drug addiction and violent crimes such as rape and assault are frequent bedfellows to its predominately Black and Puerto Rican residents. Life in this part of the Bronx is brutely blunt and the will to emerge from its constrictions of crime and hopelessness is quite a feat in itself particularly if you happen to play basketball; the competition is fierce. Most good ballplayers never make it out of the obscurity of school yard tournaments, and the really good players are a dime a dozen. Consequently in order to acquire All-American status one has to possess near astronomical ability; therein lies the case for Alex Eldridge.

The Boob has taken defensive to another level — it's not the overbearing, aggressive type of defensive that frequently permits opponents regulated visits to the free throw line, but rather is the sly, dogmatism which renders expert ball-handler's helpless in the path of his man. He has demonstrated such a prowess in this area the Boob would probably evolve a broad grin on the faces of stoney defensive specialists K.C. Jones and Al Attles, both who revolutionized the backcourt defensive game in their heyday. Similarily Alex is endowed with that same genius; against anyone he can be absolutely awe-inspiring. And if you see him play, I guarantee you will become a believer in the magic Boob.

Next year marks the finale of Boob's UMass career and his last chance at what he so richly deserves — championship recognition. This is also my wish and the wish of faithful Umies of all kinds, I would venture to say that there are even some folk in the Big Apple who are even pulling for their prodigal sons to return and burn "The Garden" up.... it can be so, for I have seen "The Magic Boob."

A task of uniting

THE PURPOSE OF THE BLACK ORGANIZERS CONFERENCE
April 15-17 — Place: S.B.A.

Black people in the 1970's are faced with severe contradictions. What are some of these contradictions? They are, mass unemployment. Some 25 per cent or more of the black community is unemployed. The great majority of black people forced to live in inner city ghettos, live in substandard high rent houses. Black school children, those not bused into white schools, have to attend schools with inadequate facilities and worst of all are forced to be miseducated.

Our communities are flooded with drugs. Racist and politically reactionary police have made an axis with drug pushers, as they get kickbacks and are paid off through the drug culture. Black on black crime is reinforced, as a Negro mafia has willingly served the police as agents against social change and have become the C.I.A. connection in the black community. Black youth faced with unemployment turn more and more to crime as the only means of economic survival. As a result, jails and prisons across the country are now 80 per cent black.

Fascist police frame black people by the hundreds every year to get them off the streets and have secretly entered into an alliance with right wing groups like the KKK and the minutemen in their over-kill plan to terrorize the young generation. This plan like operation phoenix used in Vietnam, is designed to immobilize black youth into fearing, fearing the power of the capitalist state; to instill an atmosphere of cynicism, defeat, despair, hopelessness, and fear to rebel or engage in revolution.

On top of all this, as economic conditions become worse for all poor people in America and reaches sectors of the middle class, black people who are the largest oppressed nationality in the United States are beginning to realize that our leaders, the late Malcolm X and Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. were both assassinated by the United States Government. Also, with the revelation of the Cointel pro documents it becomes very clear that an agency of the U.S. government, the FBI committed murder and other means of destruction against the Black Liberation movement. This is "Genocide", the scientific and systematic destruction of a people by a government.

Faced with these facts and the growing reality that the gains won for black people in the 1960's are rapidly being eliminated, we gather on April 15th-17th to analyze our past and present situation, to struggle against our past weakness as a social movement and to develop new strengths for the struggle ahead.

Our task before us is to unite as many in the black community as possible behind a scientific program, ideology, and organization for our common oppressor and enemy is increasing its war of genocide and repression against us.

To all black people and allies, we call attention to this important weekend and say, the Struggle Continues.

Consuelo did not intend to make you a direct target of her article. In fact, she was not pointing out anyone but was explaining the "hows?" and "whys?" of the culturally confused Black student. You were the one who used Connie as a target as you attacked her personally.

Culture means many things and your definition does not necessarily have to be Connie's and vice versa.

COMMENTARY

The Culture that Connie referred to may be interpreted as the customary beliefs and social forms of our racial background.

No one is trying to claim pure whiteness or pure blackness, but it is very unrealistic to think of ourselves as "Brown" because no matter what we think we are still being treated as inferiors because of our ebony skin color. We don't want to be looked down to or put on a pedestal, we just want equality! And we're not getting it because otherwise a program such as the Committee for the Collegiate Education of Black Students would not be necessary. Forced busing could be eliminated if predominantly Black schools were funded at the same level as predominantly white schools.

Who is trying to resegregate? We are not separating the races but indeed we are recognizing and showing respect for each others differences!

Yes, we are all part of the human race but Black people cannot forget the fact that we were and sometimes still are treated as animals. So therefore, we must first unite and identify ourselves so that we can be strong enough to make ourselves recognized as equals within the human race.

Leroy Elleby, Jr.

Graduating seniors

Leroy Elleby, Jr. will be graduating this May from the University of Massachusetts with a degree in Political Science.

Born on June 17, 1955 in Marion, South Carolina, "Big Leroy" went to the Rains-Centenary High School in Rains, South Carolina and left a name for himself before he graduated in June 1973. He was voted the "Most Valuable Player" on the basketball team and the Vice-President of the Student Council. He was also the 4-H state champion in Poultry Bar-B-Que.

Leroy came to UMass in the fall of 1973 and in that year played on the Junior Varsity Basketball team. He was also actively involved in the Orchard Hill Area Government (OHAG) as a Third World Representative, a member of the Welfare Coalition Association in Amherst, and a representative in the Webster Dorm House Council.

When asked what his objectives were, Leroy stated, "To secure a legal position in order to assist clientele, specifically minorities, whose moral rights have been severed and misrepresented. I am particularly interested in the business aspect of law."

We, the Staff of Black Affairs, wish him the Best of luck in his future.

Bessie Smith Memorial Program

On today, Wednesday, April 13, there will be a celebration honoring the memory of Bessie Smith. Ms. Smith is most popularly remembered as a great blues singer but she was a total performing artist, actress and lyricist. Musically, she was a dynamic innovator, her classic singing style has influenced vocalists to this day. She was a woman of enormous talent as stories of her life and career are legendary.

There will be a film presentation of Ms. Smith at 11:00 a.m. at the New Africa House and at 7:00 p.m. at Webster House in Orchard Hill. This film series is to include a rare collection of films including the famous "St. Louis Blues", Bessie Smith's only movie appearance. There will be five more film shows on the influence of Bessie Smith on the classical blues tradition featuring such greats as Ethel Waters, Mahalia Jackson, Billie Holiday and Lena Horne.

Professor Archie Shepp of the DuBois Department of Afro American Studies, has been very instrumental in bringing this program to campus and will be commenting on the films. This event is free and is open to the entire university community. It is indeed a rare opportunity to be truly educated about the great tradition of black music and to pay tribute to Bessie Smith.

The Ballad of Svejk

THE BALLAD OF SVEJK
Words and music by Samuel K. Lockhart
Directed by S.K. Lockhart
Kirby Theatre, Amherst College
April 9, '77

By MICHAEL P. DORAN
Below The Salt Staff

The Ballad of Svejk, a musical comedy, is an original play by S.K. Lockhart, based on the novel The Good Soldier Svejk by Jaroslav Hasek. The play concerns the adventures of Svejk the soldier in World War One Austria-Hungary.

Svejk is a comic everyman figure who tries to reduce his current experiences to something logical and coherent by comparing them to his past experiences with the plain folk of Prague. His real failure to comprehend what is going on is the central point of the story. In the translation from novel to play, Lockhart has a great deal of success, mixed in with some noticeable flaws.

One of the big problems with the play is the beginning. There was no curtain. Instead we are exposed to a confusing scene in which the actors come on stage and get dressed in their costumes under the words "Theater is a Lie" projected above. The purpose of these actions is unclear, they certainly did not help in understanding the play. That this is mere staginess on the director's part seems the reasonable conclusion.

The scene then changes to what the audience must consider "the beginning of the play", with Svejk in his pet store. This is an important scene in that the dual character of Svejk must show.

The "wise fool" idea is handled nicely in the dialogue but is unnecessarily drawn out with a song sung by Svejk. This song sums up Svejk's dilemma for us before we have gotten more than five minutes into the play. It is sung at the end of the play for a much better effect.

The songs and the singing were another general problem. The lyrics were on the whole fairly well-suited to the theme of the play. Unfortunately, the music was not. The score sounded more like a Gilbert and Sullivan piece than anything remotely involved with Austrian-Hungarian music. This precluded much of the ethnic flavor we got from the dialogue and the settings. When the group sang in chorus they were excellent, providing some very good moments in the play. The problems arose when they sang alone.

For some reason, many of the characters, most conspicuously Svejk, came totally out of character to sing. Svejk sometimes sang and danced like he just walked out of a minstrel show, totally losing any semblence of the idiotic outward appearance he should have maintained.

Another problem was that the orchestra did not take into account some of the weak voices in the cast and thus we lost about one fourth of the lyrics.

There were many excellent performances that deserve mention. Paul Rosenthal played all three of his character roles to perfection, especially Otto Katz, which was so good, it almost overshadowed the first half of the play. Matt Dolph, as Lieutenant Lukas, played his role of the self-centered military officer to very good effect. His urbane snottiness seemed very real. Brian Donovan, as Bretschnieder and Dub, took two of the best character roles and did them well. His "Wicked Witch Of The West" expressions were very funny and fit the character of Dub very well.

Duncan Anderson also handled his many roles well. Most notable was the general who in the end sentences Svejk to be hanged. Mark Pawlak, who played Svejk, only half carried out the smart idiot character, which caused many of the problems in the play. Sometimes his expressions resembled more of an innocent choir boy than a grown man baffled by the war. Part of this was due to his God-given baby face, but he should have worked in more maturity.

The play is largely a success, in that it captures the essential feeling that Hasek tried to convey in his novel. Part of the problem that any actor would have had in portraying Svejk is that he is necessarily incomplete in the story. This makes it hard to keep his function as a mirror intact in a play in which it is necessary to make him more of a character.

Nonetheless, Svejk on stage captures enough of the mirror function to show us the absurdities of the war and the society in which he participates. The ending is a very effective statement as Svejk just tries to comply with the rules of an illogical time. His last lament is that he cannot find a tree from which to carry out his last order to hang himself, and here the song from the beginning works well.

We are left with a poignant ending to a funny play that actually sums up more than just one man's situation in an absurd time. Overall, Mr. Lockhart succeeded despite some obvious flaws, making for an original play that was worth seeing.

RECORDS

BLONDIE CHAPLIN
(Asylum)

Fans of the Beach Boys will remember Blondie Chaplin as the singer-guitarist who joined the group during Brian Wilson's absence. He has now acquired the assistance of producer Rob Fraboni (of Clapton fame), the Band's Garth Hudson, and a talented group of session musicians, and produced his first solo album.

Most of the elevent songs on the album are under four minutes long and concern themselves with such time-honored subjects as "Crazy Love", "Loose Ladies", and "More Rock 'n' Roll". Chaplin wrote all of the songs, and therein lies the album's major problem: although the performances, including Chaplin's vocals and guitar, are enthusiastic and the production is first-rate, there isn't enough stylistic variation or melodic imagination to distinguish one cut from the next. The two notable exceptions are "Be My Love", reminiscent of the Little Richard school of 50's rock, and "Lonely Traveller", with some Beach Boys-like harmonies.

The overall sound of the album is suitably polished and the music is generally pleasant and entertaining, but I get the impression that Blondie Chaplin is capable of more. With some added imagination in the songwriting department, his next album should be worth looking forward to.

BAD COMPANY
Burnin' Sky
(Swan Song)

Bad Company's previous three albums have each gone platinum (sales over a million) and by sticking to the same basic formula, the band has insured the same for their newest, Burnin' Sky. Revolving 'round riff-rhythmed rock rumbling and reverberating along resoundingly regal routes (say that five times fast if you dare), this disc has definite appeal for rock fans everywhere. It has its exciting spots here and its dull spots there, but the former far outnumber the latter. Paul Rodgers' voice is, as usual, in excellent shape as he leads the quartet through the eleven songs. Guitarist Mick Ralphs, bassist Boz Burrell and drummer Simon Kirke are, if unspectacular, at least adequate in providing instrumental backup to Rodgers' vocals. Top tunes include rockers like "Leaving You," "Everything I Need," "Heartbeat," and "Too Bad." Well, too bad my time is up, so just let me conclude by granting Burnin' Sky a "rock steady" B.

TATA VEGA
Totally Tata
(Tamla)

This is Tata's second LP. Much mellower than her first, ("Full Speed Ahead") there is some real nice slow music on the disc. The hilite of the LP is in fact a slow side. "I'll Blame it On The Sun" (yes, that piece of magic by Stevie Wonder) is fully given due justice by Ms. Vega's beautiful voice. Also on the slow side of things is the first half of the nine minute cut "Come In Heaven (Earth is calling)"; the second half of this cut really takes off.

Her first LP was the "strong breakthrough" and this one is the smooth second act. It's a joy to just sit and listen to the whole of both sides. This easy listening effect is enhanced by the way the sides occasionally blend one into the other. This is especially evident with "Mr. Troublemaker's going into "I'll Blame It On the Sun". "Mr. Troublemaker" is a catchy mid-tempo side with Tata coming thru loud and clear.

With this LP, Tata is making a definite and hardly disputable claim to fame as a female vocalist. "Totally Tata" may lack the jump of "Full Speed Ahead", but her music takes on some different qualities on this LP (a sign of a good artist) that should definitely be checked out.

OHIO PLAYERS
Angel
(Mercury)

It should be generally acknowledged that the Ohio Players slept their way through 1976. Contradiction came too quick and was too thin to honorably follow the magnificent Honey. It was the first Players' album since the Westbound years to contain only two good tracks — the title cut and "My Life". And to make matters worse, the new tracks slapped onto their greatest hits lp, Gold, were even worse.

Recorded between two major tours, Angel has come out with less fanfare than previous outings. Angel is everything Contradiction could and should have been, no doubt putting the Ohio Players back in good stead with their fans.

Angel is true to past Ohio Players formulas; jazzed up soul and R&B as sleek and sensuous as silk. Of course Honey comes to mind and because Angel aspires to such excellence, it is an all-around success. "Merry Go Round", "Body Vibes," "Glad To Know Your Mine" and the title cut are wonderous things. "Body Vibes" and lp opener "Angel" are in the tradition of "Skin Tight", only more polished and more worthy of their extended times. "Merry Go Round" should pick up where "Love Rollercoaster" left off, a dynamite hit single.

With Angel, the Ohio Players prove once again that they have no challengers. The arrangement and execution is tremendous, especially the horns and guitar. Earth, Wind & Fire is pure pap compared to the force of the Players in flight. They out rock and out soul anybody this side of Stevie and Parlifunkadelic. The only thing preventing Angel from its due is the unfortunate $7.98 list price.

Alive and Well

Jacques Brel is Alive & Well & Living in Paris
English Lyrics by Eric Blau and Mort Shuman Music by Jacques Brel
Directed by Rae Allen
StageWest

By TYLA L. MICHELOVE
Below the Salt Staff

StageWest is alive and doing OK with their current production of Jacques Brel is Alive & Well & Living in Paris. Billed as a musical, it is an exciting series of Brel's songs, translated from the French by Eric Blau and Mort Shuman, and strung together by sparce, yet appropriate dialogue.

Jacques Brel's songs are dialogue enough. Each number sketches bleak moments, so common in life, with the flair that Brel has for catching the minor key in everything. And yet a note of optimism rages at times, giving the show the kick and enthusiasm that makes a performance memorable.

Jerry Rojo did not have to do much to his environmental unit. The musicians-actors had room to sit and move among the visible structural supports, and the plain wood mirrored the images created in the musical, stripping the veneer off of life and accentuating the plight of the common man.

However, the possibility of an overwhelming performance was marred by the fact that the star and director of the show, Rae Allen, had fallen off the stage during the performance of April 8, and had to be bandaged back together. She appeared the next night but as she had little mobility, she was stationed, perhaps too conspicuously, toward the back of the stage on a bar stool.

This arrangement would not have affected the production so drastically if the other members of the cast did not seem so similarly stationed. Brel's music demands action, and requires free movement to accentuate the depth of feeling, the conflicting emotions and the multifaceted characterizations within each song. This lack of motion on the cast's part was most noticeable in the faster, more rhythmic songs, such as "Marathon," "Mathilde" and "Carousel".

If it were not for the talents of Nina Menge, a StageWest newcomer, the production might have been relegated to mediocrity. Her voice and facial expressions gave the show a dimension that took it far above being just another rendition of the same old collection of songs you could have stayed home to hear on the record.

The best display of her ability as both an actress and a singer was in "Timid Frieda", a song about a country girl finding, or, perhaps, not finding a new life in the city. A mousey face with a matching mousey voice comes down to center stage and then tosses the audience looks that imply the drive within this simple country girl. It was a small gesture, a vocal inflection, but it was perfect. From that point on, it was her face and her voice, that brought most of the depth and feeling into the show.

After a period of nervousness, William Michael, another new addition to the StageWest scene, found his own. At first, it was simply that he added the best male harmonies to the lovely female vocals and then it was his performance of "Jackie".

"Girls & Dogs", the first of the really rowdy, humorous songs, came off as empty and shallow, though both Mr. Michael and another new male vocalist, Jim Canavan, tried to give it that I - don't - give - a - damn feeling.

Following this, however, William Michael had the stage to himself.

And with a fresh shine in his eye, gave the audience its first fit of laughter, although the first 'act' was almost over. He was funny as his voice squeaked over the lines "cute... cute... cute.... in a stupidass way." It was as if Brel had written the song for him, he was so full of humor and sensitivity.

For him, this kind of good feeling lasted throughout the rest of the show, giving the audience a lot of just plain fun.

Jacques Brel is Alive & Well & Living in Paris will be playing at StageWest until May 1. Curtain times on Tuesdays, Wednesdays and Thursdays are at 8 p.m. on Fridays and Saturdays at 8:30 p.m. and 7:30 p.m. on Sundays. Call the box office at 736-7092 to get a chance to see this performance.

2nd Soviet vessel seized

BOSTON [UPI] – The mother ship of the Soviet fishing fleet off New England, seized offshore for alleged fisheries violations, joined another Soviet vessel under guard at the Boston Coast Guard Station yesterday.

BOSTON: Spectators, Newsmen, Coast Guardsmen and others, look at the two Russian ships that are tied up at the U.S. Coast Guard base in Boston. Taras Shevchenko is seen at left, Antanas Snechkus right.

The Soviet transport ship carrying 111 metric tons of illicit fish arrived in Boston Harbor under armed escort yesterday and tied up beside a companion vessel seized earlier on the north Atlantic.

The 503-foot Antanas Snechkus was forced off the ocean when Coast Guard inspectors found it carried frozen blocks of cod and perch, two species prohibited by the new 200-mile fishing limit, plus more than its limit of river herring.

Following a briefing by the Coast Guard, U.S. Attorney James Gabriel Tuesday said he "can only hope that I will have the information needed to make a decision by Wednesday" on whether to press charges.

The Coast Guard is taking an inventory of the fish in the Antanas Snechkus' holds and in its logs. Other documents found on both ships also are being examined.

"We are awaiting the results of the review on the evidence," Gabriel said. "We don't have any courses of action plotted out yet. It's exactly like any other individual charged with a crime. If we decide to press charges, we'll file a complaint in District Court and the master of the Soviet ship will appear. If bail is set I assume it will be paid and he will come back at a later time for his trial."

Asked how long the ships can be detained without charges being brought, Gabriel said "The law says for a reasonable period of time and reasonableness in this case depends on a lot of facts."

The Coast Guard said the 275-foot trawler had an illegally large catch of herring, a fish it can keep small amounts of when it fishes for hake.

The Soviet transport ship, which overshadowed the 210-foot Coast Guard cutter that escorted it, tied up on the opposite side of a pier from the seized trawler.

The cargo ship's crewmen whooped and waved when they spotted the trawler workers lolling on the deck of their vessel about 100 feet away. Neither crew was allowed to leave its ship.

Coast Guardmen wearing bayonets on their belts patrolled the transport ship with M16 semi-automatic rifles slung over their shoulders.

Meanwhile, workers began unloading frozen boxes of fish from the trawler and storing them in a warehouse.

Officials said the trawler had shifted other illegal catches of herring to the cargo ship while the two were still at sea.

The trawler was inspected by the Coast Guard on Saturday and seized early the next morning. Later Sunday, crewmen of the cutter Reliance boarded the transport ship and seized its cargo Monday morning.

Cmdr. Albert C. Buechler, captain of the Reliance, said he had recommended seizing the cargo ship but was ordered by Washington headquarters to seize only its illegal cargo.

"In effect we're doing the same thing, whether we seize the ship or its cargo," Buechler said. "We've brought it in."

The Coast Guard said the transport ship contained 95 metric tons of ocean perch, two of cod and 16 of river herrings. It also had "thousands of tons" of legally caught fish.

The ship carries, water, food and other supplies to the fishing fleet and returns to the Soviet Union with their frozen catch.

short response period." But he then reemphasized the time restraint the provost had.

Market demands for particular vocations constantly change over the years, said Federow. Therefore, it is not logical for a university to allocate its resources simply to meet every shift in the labor market. According to Federow, a graduate student in economics, for more than 30 per cent of college graduates the field for which they were trained is totally unrelated to their eventual occupations. He pointed out that 47 per cent of last December's UMass undergraduates are enrolled in liberal arts.

"There is still a demand for liberal arts," said Federow.

Federow said the provost's report may also reflect a statewide long-range reorganization plan made last year by Secretary of Educational Affairs Paul Parks. Federow said he received a memo from Parks, dated March 23, 1976, which contained a draft for reorganization of higher education in Massachusetts.

In the memo, Parks proposed to assign each division of higher education – universities, state colleges, and community colleges – a specific curriculum role. According to Federow, Parks suggested that professional, career oriented training be concentrated at UMass, University of Lowell (UL), and Southeastern Massachusetts University (SMU). Students wishing a liberal arts education would go to the state colleges, while Parks said community colleges would train students in technical fields.

Federow said there has been an increased enrollment at UMass of students with an upper-class social background, with a corresponding decrease of UMass students from the lower classes. 26 per cent of the UMass class of 1971 came from the lower class; only 15 per cent of the class of 1979 are from this social class. Federow added that only one-fourth of Massachusetts' financial aid for last year went to those attending state schools.

School of Physical Education

Bischoff said the provost's faculty allocation projected for the School of Physical Education in 1982 "runs pretty much along the same lines as our plans."

"It's sensitive to the needs, pleas, and arguments for additional staff in the school," he said.

The provost's plan will give the School of Physical Education five more faculty positions. Every department except one will receive at least one more member. The Professional Preparation department will lose a faculty position. The department chairperson, Arlan F. Barber, was not available for comment yesterday.

Bischoff said the provost's plan was a "fair allocation" among the four divisions in his school.

"Every department head could always need and use more staff. There's not a department anywhere that couldn't use resources," he said. He added he couldn't see how his chairpersons could argue for more positions, especially, since the provost plan does follow a similar long-range plan of the school.

Bischoff said his school has been changing its enrollment and educational thrust from "simply teaching to a more intellectual approach."

He said the school "looked at the market (for physical education majors) and made reasonable assessments." It has cut down enrolled majors from more than 1,000 to around 500.

Bischoff explained the school is basically made of small departments with national reputation. Overall, he said, the UMass School of Physical Education is among "the top three" in the nation.

Exercise Science

Bischoff is presently serving as acting chairperson for this department, which has five tenured faculty members. The provost plan projects eight positions for exercise science, an increase of three. Bischoff said one of these additional allocations will be for the new chairperson. He added the search committee for the new head is in its final stages.

Repeating what he said about the school as a whole, Bischoff said the provost's reallocation for exercise science is in lines with the school's plans."

Athletics

The athletic department includes all forms of physical education in general physical education courses, the intramural program, and the inter-collegiate teams sport program.

Athletic Director Francis McInerney said almost 15,000 people use at least one phase of his department. 3,500 students, he said, are enrolled in the academic programs.

McInerney called the provost's allocation for his department "very reasonable." By fiscal year (FY) 1982, the athletic department will have four additional positions.

He explained the new positions will be used to accommodate increasing enrollments, especially women. Studies done in high schools, said McInerny, point to continued demands for athletics by women.

Sport Studies

Sport Studies will increase its positions from seven to eight in the provost's plan. Chairperson Harold VanderZwaag thinks there should be more.

"We are one department in the school cited as having a top program (sports management) in the United States. In light of that, we could have more positions, in relations to other schools."

But, VanderZwaag said, considering the financial restrictions, the figures are "not unrealistic".

The sports management program receives 500 inquiries daily, he said. "It's our most viable program."

There are 65 majors in sport management. VanderZwaag also said the department offers several service courses for majors in other physical education departments, as well as students from the campus at-large. These lectures average more than 100 people.

VanderZwaag noted the faculty-student ratio in the department is above the UMass average of 18:1. He estimates his department's to be around 20:1.

Carter's grandson gets protection

WASHINGTON (UPI) — President Carter's 20-month-old grandson Jason has Secret Service protection at Carter's request, it was learned yesterday.

A Secret Service spokesman said that agents began protecting Jason Jan. 24 "at the request of the President." No reason was given.

BOSTON (AP) — A small fuel company based in Mississippi filed a $450 million anti-trust suit yesterday against the American Gas Association for allegedly preventing the sale of an energy conservation device.

Charles Woolfolk, the president of the Save Fuel Company (SFC), claims that the AGA has over the last eight years persuaded utility companies and independent homeowners to boycott his "Fuel Damper" which he maintains can reduce heating bills 20 to 30 per cent.

Congress to vote on own raises

WASHINGTON (UPI) — Effective yesterday, members of Congress will have to vote "yes" or "no" on subsequent pay raises for themselves and other top government officials.

The provision was tacked onto a bill extending special unemployment benefits through Oct. 31, and President Carter signed the legislation yesterday without comment.

CG cutter causes damage

MYSTIC, Conn. (AP) — A 41-foot Coast Guard cutter on a search-and-rescue mission last week reportedly caused more than $12,000 in damages to marinas and boats docked in the Mystic River. The mission turned out to be a false alarm.

The damage allegedly was done by the cutter's four-foot wake.

Obscenity bill killed

HARTFORD, Conn. (UPI) — A bill giving Connecticut communities the power to set their own obscenity standards was killed yesterday by a legislative committee.

Because of the Judiciary Committee's action, the state will retain the power to set standards. The panel killed the bill by a 10-5 margin.

The main argument among the bill's opponents was since Connecticut is a small state, there are not great differences between the mores of the various communities.

Rep.-elect released from jail

PROVIDENCE, R.I. [UPI] — State Rep.-elect William H. Bailes was freed on bail yesterday by Rhode Island Supreme Court order, pending further action on extradition to Michigan to serve a shoplifting term.

Smiling but needing a shave after a night in the Adult Correctional Institutions, Bailey called the prison "a hellhole" and made a pitch for better facilities as he left the courthouse.

"Full speed ahead — it's the only thing we know," Bailey said of his fights to stay out of jail and get into the legislature. "I guess I'm still a little optimistic."

The court listened to a one-hour argument earlier in the day by Bailey's attorney, John A. O'Neill Jr. A representative of the attorney general's office said it had no objection to releasing Bailey on bond. The court set bail at $5,000 surety.

Bailey was freed when O'Neill counted out five $100 bills, 10 per cent of the total bail.

"If he was going to skip bail, he'd already be out of state," O'Neill said. "He doesn't want to take off. He wants to fight for his seat."

Bailey was denied his 19th District seat in January by an 82-10 House vote on grounds the state constitution bars felons from holding office or voting.

The Supreme Court did not indicate when it will rule on Bailey's appeal of his seating fight, which was argued by O'Neill and activist lawyer William Kunstler last month. The Michigan case stems from a conviction for stealing 31 record albums from a Port Huron store in 1973.

CREDIT UNION CAPERS!
starring: Cash Barrelhead
"How To Stash That Cash!"

He stood sheepishly in the doorway, a large raindrop dripping from his left ear lobe. I could see he needed help. And I could see he was broke, so I rose to throw him out! At this, a tale of woe poured from his lips. It seems his paycheck had disappeared . . . not once, but every week for the past year! I was touched.

"Disappeared where?" I wasn't surprised when he didn't know. He simply spent a little here, a little there. Then suddenly, it vanished.

"No piggy bank?" I queried. "Robbed it months ago to buy sunflower seeds," he replied.

I could clearly see his problem . . . regular income, but no regular savings plan. I explained patiently, "You have to save a little every month to get ahead. And, you have to stash it somewhere (like in a credit union savings account) so you won't be tempted to spend it. That way, it earns interest and grows, instead of doing a disappearing act."

I made my point and he promised to check into a credit union account. As he turned to leave, a relieved grin spread across his face and I generously tossed him one of my famous Money Management Calendars to help him stay financially straight in this cold, hard world of Cash.

Zaire claims French aiding Shaba Province

KINSHASA, Zaire [UPI] — Zaire said yesterday French planes were flying Moroccan troops to invade Shaba Province. But French President Valery Giscard d'Estaing said in Paris that only supplies — not men — were being airlifted.

Zaire's National Orientation Minister, Mbunze Nsomi Lebwanabi, also said Egypt had sent "aid in men" to help President Mobutu Sese Seko's regime fight an invasion force from Angola and The Sudan warned that the invasion was a threat to its security.

Mobutu also asked Nigeria, which offered to mediate in the conflict, to send neutral observers to verify his claims of Angolan, Cuban and Soviet involvement in the invasion.

Lebwanabi said "aid in men" had also been provided by Egypt, but did not specify whether the men were soldiers. Cairo has publicly backed Zaire against the invasion and has indicated it would support Kinshasa with military aid. But high Egyptian officials said privately it was unlikely the aid would include troops.

Lebwanabi said French transport planes sent by Paris Sunday were being used to ferry the first of 1,500 Moroccan troops to the battle zone in the copper belt Shaba province, formerly known as Katanga.

In Paris, Giscard went on French television and said, "The transportation being carried out by French planes concerns material exclusively," and not men. "This is not a war operation."

There are no Frenchmen fighting in Zaire and there will be no Frenchmen fighting in Zaire," he said. "These are claims which come precisely from those who are carrying out the infiltration of Zaire."

He said France's aid to Zaire was "a signal of security... and a signal of solidarity between Europe and Africa."

Asked about Zairean claims that the invaders, who are reported to be former Katangese gendarmes, are being assisted by Cuban military advisers as Mobutu claims, Giscard said, "What is certain, according to reports from the area, is that the troops... have been trained by others."

"There is no Franco-Moroccan operation," Giscard said. "There is an operation being carried out by Zaire and Morocco, and France is helping in that operation. France is acting on its own."

Giscard said he discussed Africa "in general terms" with U.S. Secretary of State Cyrus Vance, who visited Paris briefly earlier this month.

"But I did not inform him of our intention," he said. "I preferred to make this gesture without the opinion of the United States."

The Summer Program offers selected courses generally given at Brandeis during the traditional academic year, and all are taught by fulltime Brandeis faculty members. Students have the advantage of studying at a suburban campus, without the cares of parking and other problems encountered in an urban setting. Summer students have full use of all Brandeis facilities, including tennis courts and indoor swimming. The University's apartments, offering two and three bedrooms with kitchen facilities, are also available. Registration opens May 2. For additional information, call 647-2172 or write to the Brandeis Summer Program, Brandeis University, Waltham, Mass. 02154.

SALT efforts continue

WASHINGTON [UPI] — President Carter met yesterday with Soviet Ambassador Anatoly Dobrynin in an effort to keep alive the stalled nuclear strategic arms limitation talks.

American seizure of Soviet fishing vessels inside the new 200-mile limit was not considered a major topic of the meeting, a presidential spokesman indicated.

Deputy Press Secretary Rex Granum told reporters the Oval Office session between Carter and the Soviet diplomat was "mutually arranged."

On the agenda, he said, were the SALT discussions "and other issues raised in the Moscow talks" between Secretary of State Cyrus Vance and Soviet officials.

Granum stressed the session was arranged before the fishing trawler incidents and indicated he did not expect Carter to dwell on the subject.

Carter indicated last Friday — after a meeting between Vance and Dobrynin — he would be "very eager" to change his major nuclear weapons reduction proposals if the Soviets considered them "inequitable" in the balance of nuclear might.

Both sides appeared to be moving toward a compromise after the breakdown in Moscow.

The White House took the unusual step of omitting the standard picture-taking session at the start of the 4 p.m. meeting. A spokesman announced the session "has been canceled so as not to cut into the working time" between Carter and Dobrynin.

The meeting with the Soviet envoy was the last official activity of a day in which Carter put the final touches on the anti-inflation package he will outline at a 10 a.m. EST news conference Friday.

Pot legalization may go to court

BOSTON [AP] — Advocates of eliminating criminal penalties for marijuana possession have abandoned efforts to liberalize the law through the legislature and are turning to the courts.

Unlike past years, some staunch supporters of marijuana law reform and their artillery of medical experts will not testify at the legislature's Judiciary Committee hearing today on bills to remove criminal penalties from possession of the drug.

"Expert witnesses don't make any difference in the legislature after a while — but they may make a difference in the court," explained Ernest Winsor of the Massachusetts Law Reform Institute.

Winsor, a lawyer and a founder of the now defunct Committee for a Sane Drug Policy has been working to legalize marijuana in the legislature for more than six years.

This year, he admits, "short of something dramatic, the legislature is a dead end on that issue."

So this month Winsor and others will file a class action suit in the state Supreme Court claiming the Massachusetts marijuana law violates individual privacy. The state, they contend, has no constitutional right to outlaw a substance that has not been proven harmful to the body.

The fortune teller

"Please, come into my parlour."

"I'm a little bit scared. This is the first time I've ever been to a fortune teller."

"Don't worry about a thing. Just sit down and relax."

"What are you going to do?"

"I'm going to look into the crystal ball and see what the future holds."

"You mean you've got me by the ball?"

"So to speak."

"You wouldn't tell me anything bad would you?"

"I can tell you only what I see."

"Well, I guess I'm ready."

"Now please, close your eyes and open your mind and I will gaze into the crystal ball. I see... I see... a... graduation... from college."

"That's right."

"I see... letters from graduate schools... from many graduate schools."

"What do they say?"

"I can only see some of the printing... It's getting clearer... it says.... "Dear turkey"... no... the rest is gone now."

"Do you see anything else?"

"I see friends, close friends."

"What are they doing?"

"They're moving away."

"Oh no."

"Yes, and they're taking your stereo with them."

"Did they leave a forwarding address?"

"Sorry."

"Well, what else?"

"I see your family... they seem to be standing over you... they're shouting at you."

"What are they saying?"

"Your mother is saying she wants you to join the temple, your sister is saying she wants you to join the church... your father wants you to walk the dog... your brother-in-law wants you to eat a lot of ice cream... wait... now they're all shouting, "Richard, you're too skinny, eat something, eat something!"

"Quick, what else do you see?"

"I see you sneaking out of your parents' house at 4 a.m. to go to Boston to see Ric and Duck."

"Good, good...'

"Yes... you're relaxing now... you're seeing old friends... Jan and Chris... John and Mary... and many others... wait a minute!"

"What's a matter?"

"Something bizarre. You've just been elected president of the Soupy Sales fan club... you're going on a nationwide tour... you're spreading the name of white fang and black tooth all over the country."

"Come on, get serious."

"Well the reality is kind of dull."

"Which is?"

"You go looking for a job."

"Do I find one?"

"I see you dressed in a dracula costume scaring little kids at a shopping center."

"That's my job?"

"No, that's what you get arrested for. I can't see your job right now."

"Anymore?"

"It gets a little cloudy from here on."

"So that's what the future looks like."

"For now."

"It's not quite what I expected."

"I know what you mean. I was in pre-med but I did lousy on my boards. So I became a fortune teller."

"How's business?"

"Not bad. I meet a lot of interesting people and I get to wear a lot of strange clothes."

"Do you know what you're doing?"

"Does anybody?"

"Well, don't you feel sad about not being a doctor?"

"Sometimes."

"What do you do?"

I remember an old saying my Uncle Ralph used to always tell me:

"Success is getting what you want Happiness is wanting what you get"

"Does it help?"

"It can't hurt."

Boltwood-Belchertown: Recruitment woes

By ARIANE SAINS

The Boltwood-Belchertown project is designed to involve members of the community with the patients at Belchertown State Hospital in an atmosphere that will benefit both patients and community volunteers. Toward this end the project has succeeded admirably. In the public relations department, however, the administrators of the project could use a boost.

About four weeks into the semester, I decided to volunteer for Boltwood-Belchertown. I spoke with a friend who had worked for the project last year, and she told me to call Ann Bolger to get information. Ms. Bolger was pleased that I was interested in volunteering, and explained that what was most needed were people who acted as short-term advocates. Such people help patients who are about to go out on their own in the community — working with them to find apartments, shop for clothes and do other things which might be difficult for the patient to do on his-her own. Ms. Bolger told me that the person to get in touch with was Ruth Antonucci, and gave me a number where Ms. Antonucci could be reached.

"If you can't get in touch with her by Sunday," Ms. Bolger told me over the phone on Tuesday," let me know, because I'll be seeing her, and can give her your number."

When I called the number for Ruth Antonucci, I was told that she was no longer living at that number, and had moved back to campus. When I called her campus number, I was unable to get anyone at home, though I called at different times during the day and evening. When I called Ann Bolger back to tell her I could not get in touch with Antonucci, there was no one home there either.

Frustrated, but still determined to become a volunteer, I spoke to the friend who had originally told me to call Bolger. She said that it was a shame that I wasn't getting more of a response to my interest, and that she would be seeing Bolger, and would ask her to have Antonucci get in touch with me. That was three weeks ago, and though my friend spoke to Ms. Bolger, no one has called me.

At the beginning of every semester, posters calling for Boltwood-Belchertown volunteers are all over campus. Cards telling of how rewarding the volunteer work is are placed on every dining commons table. Yet it would seem that, when faced with a volunteer who does not come in at the start of the program, the recruiting system at Boltwood-Belchertown falls apart.

I can appreciate how busy Ms. Antonucci is, and this article is not intended to discourage anyone who is interested in volunteering for the program. Rather, I would hope that it would encourage those at Boltwood-Belchertown to take the extra time and effort necessary for making sure that potential people-power is utilized and that the enthusiasm and interest of those who might wish to volunteer is not turned to indifference because no one bothers to follow it up.

Ponderings on the Provost's plan

By JAY MARTUS

"Provost Angers Faculty Sen." read the headline. I drank a cup of Hatch Coffee, clutched a queasy stomach, and laughed cynically.

In the year past, every other Thursday afternoon in S.B.A. auditorium, has been another round of Faculty Senate. It is held in a darkly lit room, which slopes downwards, brightened only by conflict controversy, and adjournment. This past Thursday, my last sojourn to Fac Sen land proved to be the epitome of this description...

The meeting began as usual; announcement period. The order of announcers is ironically put in order of supposed importance. However, the Collegian reporter rarely respects this formal ordering. The Faculty Senate is often used by these same announcers to springboard onto Page one of Friday's edition. Today would prove no different.

Headline catcher today would be Provost Paul Puryear. In case anyone missed it, the new Provost's honeymoon is definitely over. Three year's ago, a review of all academic departments began. Simultaneously to this ongoing review, several important events took place. In a loose chronological order these were: the resignation of Provost Gluckstern, Governor Dukakis and budget cuts, Acting Provost Alfange, Dukakis and level funding, Provost Puryear as new provost, the union of faculty formed, and finally the review was completed. Provost Puryear chose to develop his own long range plan to deal with the specific needs of academics through 1982. For this sin of pragmatism, Puryear was the target of a verbal barrage that rivaled the D-day invasion of World War II.

What caused such a flurry of flaming rhetoric? Did Puryear abandon sanity and join in the forces of reaction and irrationality? Or has he touched upon a nerve of reality? What provoked the strongest emotional response was the issue of tenure. All the prim and proper proceduralists raised their impotent concepts of collegiate communiality.

In fact, they were echoing a flaw, which they earlier saw as a masterpiece.

Students have been saying for quite a while that an advisory role is not a satisfactory mode of governance. When the faculty unionized they forfeited their ability to deal at all effectively in the position of advisor. They have formalized an adversary relationship and must face this reality.

Puryear took on tenure in light of certain objective facts. The faculty are heavily tenured, 70 per cent in fact, and more than half are in the College of Liberal Arts. Sure enrollment shifts, but after five years of the same trend, different resource allocations may be indicated. What Puryear faced upon entering this institution was a very inflexible budget, and a well entrenched tenure system, that perpetuated the status quo. His decision to look not only at the qualifications of the individual faculty member, but the demand for positions elsewhere within the university, should be applauded.

Education should be a response to societal needs. For too long it has been at the mercy of historical precedent not relating to changes, many majors, in the conditions of our lives. Students' priorities differ from both Puryear and the faculty. But Puryear's attempt to provide flexibility seems more palatable than what we are faced with now.

Where does the union stand on such substantive issues? What were they concerned about on Thursday? Amongst other examples of pressure placed by the administration upon the union, the faculty club was mentioned. This absurd issue arose amidst such other crises of policies and decisions. Larry Roberts, the titular head of the union, complained of a $40,000 cut to the subsidation of the Faculty Club. His point was that these types of pressures were being used ruthlessly by the administration.

As usual, most everyone left immediately, after announcements and questions, myself included.

The Amherst experiment

It was something I always wanted to do — try it out, you know? And I felt a little squeamish about the whole thing, drying myself after my shower. I always had a mind to do it, I mean the opportunity was there all the while. I figured I might as well try it out now. I knew I wanted to.

So, I dressed quickly and raced down from the dorm to the Five-college bus stop just in time to board the bus to Amherst College to attend a real-life Amherst College class, to conduct the Amherst experiment.

That was three months ago and now I'm sitting in the Robert Frost Library at Amherst College just after my real-life Amherst College course, just after running some more tests in the Amherst experiment. And I've come to my conclusion.

I've diagnosed that I have a terrible disease and I guess I'm telling you because you have the disease, too. It's a disease in the mind, mine and yours, an attitude that we at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst are an inferior class in higher education. Zoo-Mass; only UMass; oh, you go to UMass? — with that condescending tone — are all attitudes we ourselves at UMass have instituted in other people's minds. It's through our own feelings of insignificance and inferiority that UMass is not all that highly regarded by people elsewhere in the state.

It was a game at first. A game I played every week entering that regal room where a chamber of Congress ought to meet. Candelier, fireplace, balcony and all and I entered with all my preconceived notions of what Amherst College people were like and what UMass meant to them. You know what I mean: UMass, the poorhouse, the slums, the oppressed members of the proletariat on the same bus route as Smith, Holyoke, Hampshire, Amherst — the elitists, the snobs, our oppressors.

Well, I started talking and even admitted to someone that I was doing a little test on Amherst College and I found out all the stereotypes were wrong. And even more important, I found that we are our own oppressors and this self-oppression is a continuous disease. It spreads from UMie to UMie to UMie prof to UMie prof: the UMass inferiority complex.

In the Amherst experiment, people didn't put their noses down at UMass. Actually they liked, actually they appreciated the general atmosphere of UMass: down-to-earth, personability in the UMass classroom, availability for learning marketable skills and knowledge, and a place where things happen, where something's always going on, where one can have four years to develop as thinking and feeling human beings, mature adults — and not just students.

But do we ever tell anyone this? We forget this and we forget even more. We forget that we attend a University which was the fastest growing in the nation in the sixties and in spite of budget cuts we do fight to keep-up the standards. We forget that UMass has one of the best Hotel Management Dept.'s in the country, one of the best Engineering Programs in the country, one of the best English and History Dept.'s in the state, a nationally known Economics Dept. which has attracted well-known national scholars "of a sort." I could go on and on.

UMass is plentiful in resources and attracts interesting and unique people with interesting and unique talents. An underground guide to colleges has labeled UMass as the place to go "if you have ivy qualities but somehow got screwed." UMass has the possibility and potential to be a leading figure in higher ed. We forget. And our attitude certainly doesn't help UMass to reach its fullest potential.

But all we remember is that we are in a state that has produced some of the finest in private institutions of learning: Harvard, Tufts, MIT, Wellesley — need I go on? But all we remember are the zany shrieks at night and the strands of toilet paper hanging on the trees and bushes in Northeast or out tower windows in Southwest. But all we remember are those towers in Southwest which have won UMass a title for providing one of the top three most squished living situations for humans in the world. But all we remember are stereotypes — the dumb UMie — the last choice school because you couldn't get in anywhere else or you didn't have the money. But all we remember is the worst — and that's all we ever tell.

And one person from Amherst, mind you — Amherst College — asked me why people from UMass stayed away, acted a bit snobbish. What was wrong? Why were people from UMass always putting themselves down? — always putting UMass down? (Think about it.)

Why can't we appreciate what we have? Why do we lower ourselves? Do we lack integrity? And that's one thing I'll give Amherst College. They have integrity. They speak well about their school.

All I can prescribe to UMies is to take some aspirin and look in the mirror and compliment yourselves some time for a change. You might find other people starting to compliment you back. And wouldn't that be a nice change!

Opposing the Multi-Billion Dollar Monster

To the Editor:

In these days of inflation, level funding and unemployment there exists a branch in the government that spends billions of dollars a year so that its services will never be used. We pump money into this program so that it will develop a system so good it will never have to be used. That's right — it has to be so good that no one will want us to use it. No one thinks twice, though, and every year more money is appropriated and more lives are spent in the development of a program whose sole purpose is not to be used. Every year the government warns us to beware, "The system is not good enough, it may have to be used." We cringe with fear and our only escape is to make the system more efficient, make it so ugly and vile that no one will want us to use it, thus we are caught in a vicious circle.

The people stand for it because they are afraid, afraid of a monster of their own creation, and now we have no control over our monster. Remember we made over a thousand last year, a thousand new nuclear warheads. Remember the Cuban Missile Crisis when we all drilled for the surprise attack; then we were all very much aware of how little control we had over this monster. It's worse today because no one is as frightened as they were in 1962 when warheads were in Cuba. But remember my friends, the Monster is bigger and much more efficient now than it was in 1962. Of course we don't want those Ruskies bullying us around, but aren't they the ones who are making us push for more and better bombs?

It's a real problem because it's a problem that has no real solution. There is no morality involved like the abortion issue, it has no sides, no publicity — thus no public consciousness. Where is everyone when it comes to simple sanity? I've never heard of a movement to eliminate Nuclear Weapons. [But I have heard of a group in England that believes the world is flat, with edges no less.] I've heard a lot about Nukes, how they can overheat and worries over the radioactive wastes. We argue over a system which at least was designed for some safety; what about the system which is designed for our own destruction? How about a little opposition for our Multi-Billion Dollar Monster?

Conference to focus on Southern Africa

To the Editor:

On April 23 and 24 students from up and down the East Coast will be attending a conference on "Southern Africa: The Struggle For Liberation And The Tasks of The American People."

Students will be coming from the University of Maryland [where there has been a building takeover around University complicity with South Africa], Patterson State College, New Jersey [where students have forced a ban on all recruiters of corporations in South Africa], Boston State College [where students are preparing to give Polaroid recruiters a warm welcome], and UMass-Amherst, to name a few.

The events in Southern Africa are of worldwide importance and spotlight some of the most important developments taking place in the world today. The Conference will be an excellent opportunity to discuss some important and controversial questions: The role of the U.S., the Carter-Young Plan; Pan-Africanism and the role of the Soviet Union in Southern Africa.

With clarity on these questions we will better be able to support the fight for freedom in Southern Africa. It will provide the opportunity to share experiences and lessons gained from the growing movement against U.S. support for the white minority regimes. Plans will be made for African Liberation Day, May 28, in Washington D.C., as well as raising money, clothing and sneakers for the liberation groups.

The Conference will be followed Sunday with a rally in NYC and march to the South Africa Embassy.

Buses will be leaving from UMass. For more information call 256-0501 or 545-3655.

The Conference is sponsored by the Revolutionary Student Brigade. Locally it has been endorsed by:

Jay Martus and Paul Cronin [former co-presidents UMass SGA]

Nkrumah Olinga [Human Rights activist]

Brian DeLima [speaker of student senate, UMass SGA]

Nana Shesebe [member PanAfricanist Congress of Azania]

Marion L. Batiste and Jon Hite [SGA co-presidents]

Herb Tyson [UMass SGA senator]

Stan Kinnard [C.L.S.A.]

William Sundstrom [Exec. Editor of Daily Collegian]

Gerry Norton [Veteran's Coalition for Community Affairs]

Leo H. Ailey [Veteran's Coalition for Community Affairs]

Concert woes

To the Editor:

Numerous controversies have arisen recently, speculating what bands would be at, and even if there would be, a spring concert. I would like to go on record stating at this time, it doesn't look as if there will be a concert. To date nothing has been done. NINE out of TWELVE people have resigned from the Spring Concert Committee. While I do not claim to speak for all resignees, I do speak for myself and I believe many others in criticizing:

1. Total lack of communication flowing from the Executive Chair position held by David Kantor to anyone working on the show.

2. The uncooperative condescending attitute on the part of the Executive Chair.

3. No previous experience working on concerts by David Kantor other than an internship with the Springfield Symphony one year ago.

4. The payment of $100-wk during intercession to David Kantor for concert work; work which we have yet to see. No one else has been paid a penny.

David Kantor is and was the only person charged with booking groups and with the ultimate responsibility. Without the groups, nothing can be done.

UMass: A glorified trade school

To the Editor:

When I first came to UMass, I was extremely impressed with the wide range of offerings that allowed me to pursue my every interest, one of them being to study Polish. I am about to complete my second year of Polish and though it did not tie in with my major, I have gained a lot from it. I have come to admire the Slavic Dept. members for their helpfulness and dedication.

It is inconceivable to me that the University would actually consider phasing out the Slavic Dept., especially when Russian is the language of one of the world's leading countries. It also gives the Slavic people in this area a chance to explore their ethnic background and roots. I was told when I came here that UMass was a place of higher education. If the proposed departmental cuts are carried through, UMass will become nothing but a glorified trade school.

ONE OF THE STOP & SHOP COMPANIES Stop & Shop SUPERMARKETS

It's the right time (and the right price) to try our "meatier" ground beef.

Now's the right time to check out your backyard barbecue grille for summer service.

And now's the right time to check out our "meatier" ground beef for juicier, tastier hamburgers. Backyard grilled or oven broiled.

It's the right price, too. A very special price--only 59¢ a pound for Stop & Shop 26% Ground Beef. It doesn't exceed 26% fat. Never, ever. There's a big "26%" on the package, so you can tell at a glance.

Since the time is right and the price is right; check out our "meatier" ground beef. But don't stop with just Stop & Shop 26% Ground Beef.

Our 20% Lean Ground Beef is only 20% fat. That's a lot less fat than most other lean ground beef you find in supermarkets. You get more meat to eat in this ground beef because there's less fat to cook away. Whether you're barbecuing, meatloafing, meatballing–or however you enjoy good, meaty ground beef. There's a label with a big "20%" on this one to help you pick it out.

Our 14% Extra Lean Ground Beef is only 14% fat. That's really for dieter's meatloaves, meatballs, casseroles, because any less fat than 14% and ground beef has a tendency to cook dry.

This week is the right time--at the right price--to check out Stop & Shop "meatier" Ground Beefs. You'll find the percentage-of-fat figures big and legible on all Stop & Shop Ground Beefs. That's because we have the lowest fat ratios, and you end up with more meat to eat. That's why Stop & Shop is 'my store' for ground beef to more people every day. Begin with it today. It's the right time. And the price will never be righter.

Only Stop & Shop makes these 3 meatier Ground Beefs.

Dance and supper to be held Saturday

The Coalition for Environmental Quality (CEQ) is sponsoring a contra dance and pot luck supper Saturday night at 6:30 in Farley Lodge. Tim Grey and friends will be playing contra dance music and leading you through dances so, even if you have never contra danced before, we can show you how. CEQ will be providing the main dish for the supper so you should bring either a salad, beverage or a dessert. Donations will be accepted for the musicians.

Finland exchange still has openings

Would you like to study in Finland next year? The UMass academic year program with the University of Helsinki in Finland still has opening(s) for qualified undergraduates wanting to spend 1977-78 in Scandinavia.

The expansive campus of the University of Helsinki is situated at the center of Helsinki, the capital of Finland. Its location offers a unique opportunity to travel throughout Europe, including Russia. Helsinki is Northern Europe's largest university with a student body of nearly 25,000.

A knowledge of Finnish is recommended but not absolutely required for participation in the exchange. Most lectures are given in either Finnish or Swedish, but classes in English for foreign students are also given. Many professors are willing to allow examinations to be taken in English as well as providing alternate English reading lists.

UMass students receive full credit toward their degree upon successfully completing this year in Finland. The estimated cost of a year at Helsinki will be approximately the same as a year on the Amherst campus. The only additional expense is international air fare.

Students interested in obtaining more information about this exchange program should contact either Sterling Lamet or Maryelise Lamet in the International Programs Office, 239 Whitmore, 545-0746.

Parking board offers tips to avoid towing

The Parking Appeals Board would like to offer the following advice which could save you from getting a ticket and-or from getting your car towed.

If your car should ever break down and is left in an illegal space, for example a tow zone or in any lot where you are not registered, you should notify the UMass Police Department immediately and explain the situation.

If you need your car to move heavy equipment you should notify the Parking Office for a temporary loading permit or, if the Parking Office is closed, call the Police Department.

If you use a mobile decal be sure that your car is registered through the University Parking System. A mobile decal is not valid on a car that has not first been registered with the Parking Office.

If you have any questions or doubts about parking regulations consult the Motor Vehicle Rules and Regulations Handbook which you can pick up at the Parking Office or at the police department.

What's Happening

Schools to screen for special needs

The Amherst-Pelham public schools will conduct a pre-school screening to identify children with special needs at the South Amherst School Friday. This screening is in accordance with Chapter 766, the state's special education law, which requires that services be provided for identifying pre-school age children with special needs. An orientation meeting for parents who have questions about the screening process will be held at 9 a.m. on April 13 at the South Amherst School.

We would encourage anyone who has or knows of a child who has given you concern in any of these areas to call Liz Brinkerhoff, 253-2188, for a screening appointment. Screening is by appointment only at the South Amherst School.

'Night & Fog' tonite

As part of Holocaust Remembrance Week. "Night and Fog," a film portrayal of the destruction of European Jewry by the Nazis, will be shown tonight at 8:30 in Bartlett Auditorium.

Austrian filmmaker to screen his works

Peter Kubelka, Austrian independent filmmaker and curator of the Austrian Film Museum in Vienna, will screen and discuss his complete works (1953-1977), tomorrow at 8 p.m. in Thompson 102. Although not an American, Kubelka is considered one of the most important members and influences of the new American cinema due to the distinctiveness and precision of his works. Admission is free.

Your Birthday

by Stella Wilder

Wednesday, April 13 — Born today, you are not an especially demonstrative person, but you have deep and lasting affections that you reveal privately — but completely — to those whose right and desire it is to know of them. You enjoy all of your associations with children, for you find it easier to relate to the more or less simplistic responses of the very young than to the more complicated and often highly emotional reactions of adults. This does not mean, however, that you are unable to create and sustain a truly adult relationship; it only means that in your daily contacts, you find it more comfortable to interact with those who are relatively inexperienced and whose demands upon you will be fewer and less harsh than those put upon you by your peers or superiors.

Although you are a very active person physically, you actually prefer the more quiet life. You are not an intellectual in the sense of taking your greatest pleasure from erudite pursuits; you do, however, find mental activity an absolute necessity if you are to be happy and reasonably well adjusted to your lot. You are somewhat inclined toward aloofness, but you are quite willing to try to overcome any feelings of shyness that might cause others discomfort in your presence. You believe first of all in courtesy -- which, in your book, means making others feel as comfortable as possible at all times.

An inventive person, you are never at a loss for ideas. When all else fails, others are inclined to turn to you to discover new ways and means of accomplishing their ends. You prove over and over again how different you are simply by virtue of the original approaches you take to usual problems.

Thursday, April 14

ARIES (March 21-April 19) — You would be wise to let down your hair in the presence of family and friends. Otherwise, your reputation suffers.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) -- If it is pleasure you seek, you may be barking up the wrong tree. Make an effort to contact one who knows where your talents lie.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) — A balance between the material and the spiritual much be attained before you can happily run through the chores and bores of the day.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) — Take time out for family fun. Enjoy younger family members while you can; there are ill winds blowing at evening. Be prepared to move quickly.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) — Don't be too mindful of your position. If you are tempted to lord it over others, remember your beginnings and repent.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) — The power of reason overcomes the emotional responses so detrimental to successful counterattacks. Listen to your own logical progression.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) — Another may attempt to talk you into doubting your own talent. If you are wise, you will bolster your confidence and go on from there.

SCORPIO (Oct.23-Nov. 21) — Spend some time trying to increase your potential for earning. Adult education offers some attractive possibilities.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) — Look for an opportunity to prove your superiority. You are capable of overcoming great odds; see that you do just that today.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) — Present circumstances may give you much to complain about. You would do better, however, in finding ways to overcome the situation.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) — It will take courage and more than a little bluff to face up to the opposition today. Family and friends may argue against you.

PISCES (Feb.19-March 20) — Take care that you don't turn a deaf ear to the perfectly legitimate warnings of others. Listen carefully to a rundown of the rules.

Muddy field hurts mobility

Ruggers dumped by Portland

By RICHARD MOORE
Collegian Staff

The UMass rugby football club lost by a combined 39-4 score to a tough Portland amateur club Saturday in Portland, Maine.

The Minutemen, who mustered three sides for the Portland trip, had their outstanding team speed neutralized by a very muddy playing field.

The UMass A side gave Portland its toughest challenge, losing 12-4, after being down 8-4 with only three minutes left in the game.

Portland scored first for a 4-0 lead, but UMass tied the game when a deflected Portland kick was grabbed by Minuteman Frank Kenney, who galloped 25 yards for the try.

The Maine men scored again for a 8-4 lead when a UMass clearing kick failed to go out of bounds and Portland's fullback took it in for the try.

The second half was frustrating for UMass as the Minutemen could not get their offense untracked and never seriously threatened the Portland lead.

"The forwards played well," UMass coach 'Doc' Laurence said, "and considering Portland beat Providence (regarded as one of the top three clubs in New England) I'm reasonably pleased with our A side."

"The mud really hampered our style of play, it is a great equalizer," Laurence said.

"There's no question we would have done much better on a dry field," Laurence added, "because we have a lot more speed than Portland."

The UMass B side took a 15-0 defeat. Portland scored three first half trys by using a strong wind to kick the Minutemen into bad field position, and UMass couldn't come back.

"We didn't win any line out ball and that hurt," Laurence said, "but we really couldn't move against the Portland defense anyway."

All three UMass sides sputtered offensively because the back-field ball handling was not quick enough.

"We didn't get the ball out from our centers to our wings," Laurence said, "and that is what opens things up offensively."

"When the ball gets back to the wing it creates inside breaks, gives your forwards time to get into the play and enables you to use the entire width of the field," Laurence added.

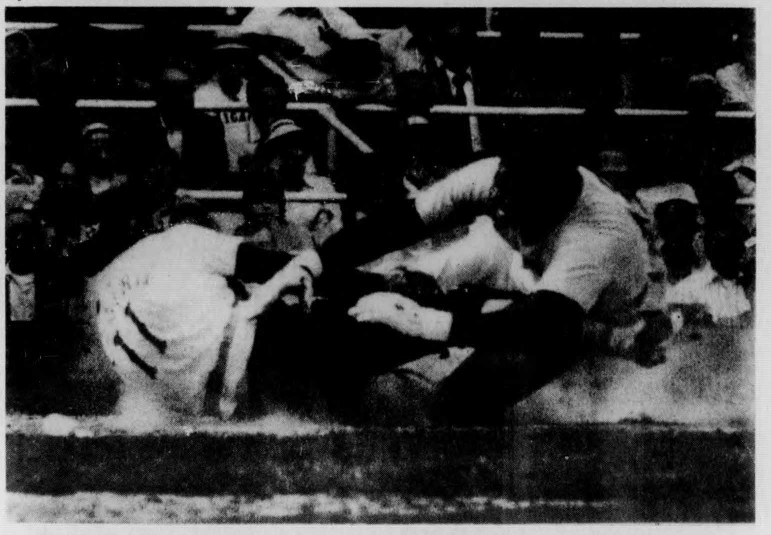
Orta sparks Chisox past struggling Sox

CHICAGO [UPI] — Jorge Orta banged out a single, double and triple yesterday, driving in two runs, to lead left-hander Ken Brett and the Chicago White Sox to a 5-2 victory over the Boston Red Sox.

Orta's first inning double scored Ralph Garr, who had singled. Orta's second-inning single, which capped a four-run inning for the White Sox, also scored Garr, who had singled and stolen second.

Prior to Orta's single in the second, Oscar Gamble walked and stole second, and came in on Eric Soderholm's single. Soderholm reached third on Chet Lemon's double and scored on Garr's infield single. Lemon also scored on Garr's hit when Boston third baseman Butch Hobson threw wildly after fielding the ball.

Brett, 1-1, lasted 7 2-3 innings and gave up 10 hits before Dave Hamilton came in to gain his first save. Rick Wise started for the Red Sox, but was knocked out of the game in the second to take the loss.



George Scott gets tagged out at the plate after attempting to score from second base on a hit to right field in the first inning. (UPI)

Naiad extravaganza begins

By LAURA BASSETT
Collegian Staff

The Naiads will present their annual creative extravaganza beginning tonight and running through next Monday, April 18. The Naiads have been preparing for the show since last fall and these six performances will culminate long evenings of practice and preparation.

According to co-president Laurie Green, the Naiads are an aquatic arts club which combines stunts and theatrics within synchronized swimming. Each routine is a composition based on a particular theme done to music by solos, duets or small groups of swimmers. This year the "big production" will include 11 small routines and a finale.

Each routine has been written by members of the club. They select their own music, create special lighting effects and costumes to accompany the routines. According to Green, this year, "there is a variety of music including selections from Cabaret, by Fleetwood Mac, traditional Classical music and the finale is based on Walt Disney's "It's a Small World."

There are currently 36 members in the club. Tryouts are held every fall for new members. According to Green, "just about anyone who can swim and show a potential to learn will be in the club." The stunts are taught in the fall and during the spring semester the routines for the spring show are developed and practices are held every night.

The Naiads are an entirely student-run group. They are a recognized RSO group but receive no funding from the Student Senate. Ticket sales from last year's performances covered the expenses this year. All revenues collected this year will be applied for next year's production.

Aquatic arts are as creative and expressive as any arts medium and use of water as the background creates many interesting and exciting images. For 75 cents for students and $1.50 general admission, an inexpensive look at creativity is waiting for everyone.

Members of the UMass Naiad squad wave a friendly hello to spectators who surround the pool. The Naiads would like to see many faces by poolside this week. (Staff photo by Chris Bourne)

Tracksters prep for relays with meet against Rams

By MIKE BERGER
Collegian Staff

Since the fall semester, the UMass men's track team has waited for a week like this. For the first time, in a year, track will take the spotlight as UMass faces URI today and hosts the second annual UMass Relays. On Saturday both meets will take place at Llewlyn Derby track with today's meet scheduled for a 3:00 start.

Saturday, starting at 10 a.m., an estimated 600 track participants will crowd Derby Track for events that will probably last until 5:30 p.m. Thirty-six men's and women's teams from all over New England and as far away as New York and New Jersey will collect on the quarter mile track to compete in 30 events.

The ovalteam, now 2-1, is looking for its second straight victory. With a sunny, 70 degree day predicted, assistant coach Arnie Morse is expecting no problem from the Rams.

"URI has a much larger track program than Holy Cross, a team we beat last Wednesday. They do have some fine individuals but their depth is not much. It will be a meet for us in which we experiment with individuals and concentrate on sharpening up. Hopefully the weather will be warm enough to produce our fastest times," said Morse.

The Rams' best performers are in the pole vault, 120 high hurdles, long and triple jump, half mile, two mile, and quarter-mile. URI is a young team, having recruited many freshmen. Bill Hartley, a polevaulter, rated second in the US in high school competition, has done a personal best of 16'4.

Gary Hague, a 4:11.3 miler, and freshman two-miler Mike Gigooly lead the distance events. Gigooly, an All-New England high school mile runner, has run a 9:58 two-mile. Middle distance runner Don Briand is the team's best half miler with a 1:54.5 timing.

In the speed events, URI has recruited a 9.8 100-yard dash sprinter and a 50-second quarter-miler named Ralph Windle to give the sprinting events some good competition.

Other than Hartley, the only other outstanding competitors in the field events are Eliot Butcher and Ed Gray. Butcher and Gray have hit the 23' barrier in the long jump while Butcher has also gone over 45' in the triple jump.

For UMass, coach Ken O'Brien will suit up 85 men to compete in 18 events. Last Wednesday, O'Brien's team destroyed the Crusaders in an sway meet at Holy Cross, 93-59. In its 34-point margin of victory, UMass recorded 11 firsts, eight seconds, nine thirds, and five sweeps. The victory also marked the first time in three years that the field event participants scored almost half the team's total points.

Besides the javelin sweep, the 440, 880, two-mile and the long jump all recorded eight point totals. Other first places in the Crusader meet belong to Mark Healy - 440. Cliff Staples - two mile, Brady Mayer - triple jump, Tony Pendleton - long jump, Joe Marten - high jump, and the mile relay squad of Mickey Baugh, Fran O'Keefe, Rich Thompson, and Jim Hunt.

Miller time for Diamond men; face Holyoke semi-pros today

By JUDY VAN HANDLE
Collegian Staff

The UMass baseball team will be playing the first game in its history against a professional team when it takes on the Holyoke Millers today at 2:00 on Earl Lorden Field.

The idea for the game came from UMass coach Dick Bergquist. Upon hearing that there would be a team in Holyoke this season, Bergquist called Millers general manager Tom Kayser two months ago to see if an exhibition contest could be worked out.

According to Bergquist, the GM was receptive to the idea and thus the game.

The UMass coach had been interested for many years in playing a pro team, but could never work a game out.

"I tried to get the Pittsfield team to play us a few years ago, but their general manager, Pat McKernan, was not receptive to the idea," he explained.

Bergquist added that he had tried to contact the Boston Red Sox on several occasions, but was unable to arrange a game with them.

"It was probably because we are way out in Western Mass., and they didn't want to make the trip," he said.

Bergquist said that he thinks there are three main reasons why Holyoke took up the Minutemen's invitation to play here today.

"I think, number one, that since they are new to the area, they want to spread the word about their team. Second, they probably want to hit the University community. And, third, they need a place to play when they break camp," he said.

The Millers are slated to arrive here around 10:00 this morning, and work out on Lorden Field for a couple of hours before the game.

According to Bergquist, the UMass nine is looking forward to playing the pro outfit.

"They're really excited about it," he said. "They'll be able to play against great players and future pro stars. Plus, of course, pro scouts should be around, too."

Bergquist added that UConn will play the Red Sox Double-A affiliate, Bristol, tomorrow, so the Minutemen won't be alone when it comes to playing pro teams in exhibitions.

UMass BCeiged by surging Eagles

By JOHN LOWNEY
Collegian Staff

CHESTNUT HILL — Boston College catcher Tim Dachos greeted UMass reliever Dave Tewhill with a line shot to deep center field to score the winning run yesterday in a frustrating, mistake-marred afternoon for the Minutemen.

UMass will get a quick chance to rebound from the 4-3 defeat as it hosts the Holyoke Millers, the Milwaukee Brewers' Eastern League franchise, this afternoon at 2:00.

Tewhill, who has had his share of hard luck this season, entered in the bottom of the ninth with a chance to salvage a game in which starter Jeff Reardon was extremely effective.

With BC third baseman Bob Santilli (three hits in the game) on second base with one out, Tewhill fired two fast balls, the second of which Dachos assaulted. It was the second solid hit in the game for the South Hadley sophomore.

"I probably should have thrown a slider," said Tewhill. "The fast ball was up, but it was outside. I was out there for so short a time that it seems like some sort of a nightmare."

It was a disappointing conclusion for one of Reardon's best pitched games this year. After surrendering two early runs, one on a long homer by Kevin MacDonald, the hard throwing right hander was virtually untouchable.

Reardon, who struck out nine while walking only one, commented, "Today was the first time I've had my good fast ball. My arm felt stronger than its felt all spring."

Reardon is not a stranger to low scoring, one run games. Less than two weeks ago he was a 1-0 loser at SMU. For the first six innings yesterday his teammates could not touch BC ace Ron Luongo.

Trailing 2-1, the Minutemen finally reached the BC flamethrower. After Luongo walked Dale Stone, Charlie Ciccone's sacrifice bunt attempt was fumbled by the pitcher. Luongo then fired a pitch over everyone's head to move the runners over.

Leadoff man Ed Skribiski then lined a shot to center to score pinch runner Bill Hendy. Paul Abramowicz followed Skribiski with a ground single to left to knock in the go-ahead run.

BC came back in the bottom of the seventh with a tainted run to tie the score. Santilli bounced an infield hit and advanced on a wild pitch. Then Skribiski, who minutes before had knocked in the tying run, booted a Dachos ground ball to allow Santilli to race home.

The seventh inning typified the Minutemen's inconsistency yesterday. Failure to move runners on sacrifice bunts and fielding mistakes plagued UMass, preventing it from pulling ahead of the Eagles.

"I was disappointed with our lack of execution," said head coach Dick Bergquist, "and I also thought we should have hit Luongo a little better, too."

Luongo, described by Bergquist as a "good, but not great college pitcher," matched Reardon's smoke throughout the game. He showed signs of wildness with men on base, however, and was saved by the Minutemen's ineffective execution.

BC, which is now 4-0 on the year, impressed with its strong bats. 6'4", 210 lb. shortstop MacDonald was particularly devastating, as he blasted two long flies in addition to his 400 foot home run.

The Minutemen will undoubtedly see some more strong hitting today against Holyoke. Jerry Erb and Dave Stoller are expected to throw against the Millers, who have just returned from spring training in Arizona.

Big Green meets Gorillas with monster-sized squad

By BEN CASWELL

When the Dartmouth College lacrosse team takes the field this afternoon (3:00 p.m., behind Boyden) to face-off against Garber's Gorillas, the meaningfulness of its nickname — the Big Green — will become quite apparent.

Although of course all of the Dartmouth College sports teams have had that nickname for years, this season the lacrosse team lives up to its image immensely.

UMass' Kevin Patterson and the rest of the Gorillas will try to up their record to 3-2 as they face the Big Green of Dartmouth this afternoon. (Staff photo by Chris Bourne)

According to UMass coach Dick Garber, the Big Green of Dartmouth are exactly that, big, and in some cases green.

"Dartmouth has a good attack," said Garber. "They also have some big middies and overall they are a very physically aggressive team."

Dartmouth College, with three midfield groups, also stands to have a fair amount of depth, and as Garber aptly put it, "We are going to have to be sharp; any Ivy team is tough. There's no question about it."

Dartmouth College's record now stands at 2-2 as does the record of Garber's Gorillas. Against Hofstra, a team UMass lost to 10-8, the Big Green were put down by a 13-6 margin. Dartmouth College also played another nationally-ranked team, the U.S. Naval Academy. The midshipmen of Navy bombed the Big Green, 17-7.

The Ivy League team's two wins came against Salisbury State (16-11), one of the top Division II teams in the nation from Maryland, and against Yale College, one of the Big Green's Ivy League counterparts which Dartmouth defeated 9-7.

The green in the Dartmouth College lineup is in the person of its goaltender, Charlie Moore, who is a freshman. Moore split the work in goal with junior Peter Lea in the Big Green's first two games and then Moore took over the complete job against Navy when the midshipmen fired 77 shots on him. Actually, Moore might not be as green as he could be for a freshman.

As a freshman last season, Jeff Hickey was Dartmouth College's leading scorer. So far this season, Hickey has again been playing that role and as of the Salisbury State game he had led the team in goal scoring with nine.

Last year, Garber's Gorillas completely outplayed the Big Green in a lopsided 24-10 victory at Dartmouth. Jeff Spooner had five goals in that game, one of which was his 100th career goal at UMass. Kevin Patterson had four goals and Micky Menna had three. Hickey had four goals for the Big Green last year against UMass.

Dartmouth College is aggressive, but as Garber explained, "We are not looking for a head battling contest. We hope to rely on our passing and speed rather than thumping bodies."

Celts top Spurs

BOSTON [UPI] Charlie Scott, playing his best game since returning from a broken left forearm, scored seven straight points early in the fourth period last night to give the Boston Celtics a 104-94 win over San Antonio in the first game of their NBA preliminary series.

The Celtics can wrap up the best of three series Friday night in San Antonio.

Scott, who missed 38 games before rejoining the club April 3, took control after San Antonio had closed to 79-73 one and a half minutes into the fourth quarter. The slender North Carolina graduate scored on a driving layup, then hit a far away jumper and converted the subsequent free throw and followed with another basket — all in a one minute stand — to put Boston ahead to stay at 86-73.

Scott finished with 13 of his 19 points in the fourth quarter. Backcourt mate Jo Jo White led all scorers with 24 points, 12 in the final period.

The Spurs had trailed by 14 points, 65-51, midway through the third period, but outscored Boston 18-6 to pull within two points, at 71-69 late in the third period. But Boston scored six straight points to lead 77-69 less than one minute into the final quarter.

Campbell in hot soup

Maybe I am sadistic in nature, or maybe I am just overly jealous of today's professional athletes, but let me tell you friends, it was great to see Bill "Million-Dollar" Campbell take the beating he took this past weekend.

To tell you the truth, I found myself pulling for the Cleveland Indians to really jump all over Campbell, and that is unusual for a Red Sox supporter like me who, as the saying goes, never forgets to keep his Sox on.

But there was something inside of me that wanted to see the guy do badly.

The funny thing about the whole mess is that I found that I am not the only one who shared these feelings. On Opening Day in Fenway Park, Mr. Campbell was greeted by the friendly Bostonians with a welcoming sign which read, "Sell Campbell ... Bring back $1.50 bleachers."

And when he was introduced to the crowd with the rest of the team at the beginning of the game, he was greeted with a cold round of applause, as a chorus of boos and hoots rang throughout the crowd.

Then came his chance to show the Fenway Faithful that he was worth all the money the Sox paid him, which of course led to a further increase in the price of tickets.

After starter Ferguson Jenkins tired in the game's lategoing, Campbell was called upon by Manager Don Zimmer to put an end to a Cleveland rally.

In he rode to the pitcher's mound from the right-field bullpen, greeted once again by more skeptical jeers and boos.

The pressure was on the Million-Dollar man and right off the bat, in the first game of the season, Boston fans had a chance to see if their money was well spent or not.

Campbell made a favorable initial impression on the crowd as he put down an Indian rally in the eighth inning but he created his own mess in the ninth and eventually lost the game after giving up a game-tying home run in the ninth inning to the Indians' Buddy Bell.

All right, so the guy blows his first chance to impress the fans, but don't worry, harks the Bosox management, he will shine in his next outing.

Campbell did get a chance to shine in his next outing in the next game on Sunday, and what an outing it was.

As he went into the game with the score tied at 4-4, the Million-Dollar man proceeded to pitch like a $20,000 dollar rookie as the Indians shelled him. Once again, the ineffective Million-Dollar man comes through in the clutch of losing another game.

What is the meaning of this story do you ask?

It is very simple, my friends. There is no professional ballplayer on this earth that is worth the ridiculous amounts of money they are getting paid, while you and I the fans who support these people, have to pay continually rising ticket prices.

'I don't know what the Red Sox had in mind when they signed Campbell for all that money, but the man just isn't worth it. Sure, it is only the beginning of the season, but I don't care if the guy ends up winning 10 ball games and has 30 saves, the guy just isn't worth all that money.

What makes him so special a person that he can command such a salary? Not only him, but how about Fisk, Lynn, Tiant, and Scott? Why should these guys be paid so much money? It would be one thing if these guys hit and played like millionaires, but half of the time they look like average ball players.

Professional athletes in America are just spoiled rotten and behave like little kids who need a blanket for security. These big-babies claim they need millions for security.

But there is no one to blame but the sports fans themselves. By placing such a high value on sports and on particular players, today's athletes are able to command such salaries.

As the saying goes, "You asked for it ... and you got it."

Spring Concert talent set

By NIKKI ARONSON
Collegian Staff

Pousette String Dart Band, Richie Havens, Procol Harum, Jennifer Warrens, South Side Johnnie and the Asbury Jukes, and Conjumto Libre will be appearing for the Spring Concert on May 7. The names were announced last night during the Undergraduate Student Senate meeting.

The Senate had voted last week to give $25,000 to the Concert Committee to finance a free concert for students.

According to committee member Jack Albeck, "the acts will not be contracted until Friday but everyone has penciled in UMass on their calendar of events."

Albeck assumed booking duties after he "saw where the concert was heading." Albeck worked in co-operation with Program Council chairperson Bonnie Levitan to secure acts that would "appeal to the greatest number of students."

Albeck, a sophomore engineering student has experience with concert organization from his affiliation with the Program Council. He said he realized the need for more power to secure "known and popular acts" and used a middle agency to obtain Procol Harum.

"Usually you find an act and work the concert date around him," said Albeck, "but given the circumstances I looked at the groups who were playing around Connecticut and Boston and asked their agents if they would be available for the May 7 date."

Albeck said the first groups to be contacted were Pousette String Dart Band and South Side Johnnie and the Asbury Jukes. "They had been well received here before and I was pretty sure they wanted to come back."

Informed sources told the Collegian last week that former executive chairperson David Kantor was asked to resign from position.

Kantor, who had been responsible for booking talent with a budget of $67,000, was unable to secure any acts for the May 7 date.

Kantor spoke before the Senate last week requesting that the money encumbered by the Senate be set aside in favor of appropriating "between $20,000 and $25,000 for a free concert."

When asked why he had succeeded where his predecessor seemingly failed, Albeck replied, "I couldn't really give an answer to that, I guess you have to know the proper way to speak to agents over the phone."

Undergraduate Student Senate Speaker Brian DeLima said in a telephone interview that "the whole concert has been restructured as far as committees go." He said, "In order to get more of a feeling of unity" there would "be no executive chairs." He explained that all the persons who had "hung in there" over the past months of the concerts planning stages had combined their efforts to form one central concert committee.

"Most of the people on the original committees are gone," Albeck said, "I was on the ticket committee but with a free concert there are no tickets to be sold."

Albeck stated that he sees "no difference in music but in the eyes of the University there is a difference between black bands, female singers and the like." After Pousette String Dart Band and South Side Johnnie Albeck said he had to "consider Affirmative Action policies."

"The concert will be more of a festival now," Albeck said of the free concert. The total expenditure for the acts will be "about $16,000 which leaves some $9,000 to spend on production."

In addition to having jugglers and parachutes scheduled for the spring event, there will be "food and beer available sponsored by the Outing Club."

Weather permitting, the concert will be held in the Stadium with tentative starting time scheduled "around 10 a.m." The alternative concert location has been designated as the Cage. Albeck said this second plan will be implemented only "if it rains or some other act of God occurs."

A concert recruitment meeting will be held in SBA 120 at 7:30 p.m. on Tuesday, April 19 for "everyone on campus who didn't think they could get involved with the concert before this time," Albeck said.

Miser critical of Puryear Plan

This is the fifth in a series of articles examining University programs and majors that stand to be affected by the provost's five-year plan. The provost sent his plan to deans and directors on March 24 and has asked them to respond by tomorrow.

By JOE QUINLAN
Collegian Staff

The chairperson of Industrial Engineering and Operations Department in the School of Engineering yesterday critized Provost Paul L. Puryear's long range re-allocation plan.

"If I were teaching a course in long range planning, and the provost were my student, I would not give him an 'A'," said Hugh Miser.

Russel C. Jones, dean of engineering said he agrees "philosophically" with the plan.

"It has teeth," said Jones. "It's time for action, not just for talking. It should be done every year."

The provost's plan projects five additional faculty positions by 1982 for the School of Engineering. There are now 81 instructors in the school.

Some of the engineering chairpersons said they could use greater allocations than the provost has proposed. One department head would not comment about the allocation for his programs. The chairperson of Chemical Engineering could not be reached for comment.

The School of Education is currently reorganizing its own departments or "clusters." The provost has not projected any concrete figures for the school, yet.

Miser said he has been involved with long range planning for 25 years, and has been "unsuccessfully" urging UMass to use it since he came here eight years ago.

Miser as a long ranger planner for UMass said he would study how the school can serve the needs of Massachusetts. He noted the provost's plan "does not say anything about Massachusetts except its economics and birth rates," when projecting future UMass enrollment figures.

"If the state needs 20 per cent of its kids in public higher education, and UMass takes only two per cent, then the birth rate has no impact on the issues."

Miser said when allocating funds for professional schools, one should look at the job market for the fields of study. He explained that a business analyzes the demand for a particular product before deciding how much to supply.

If it won't satisfy the needs of the people, Miser said, the product wouldn't sell.

He said he can't see making internal issues the basis for reallocation within the university.

Miser said liberal arts serve different social purposes than professional schools. A liberal art major's degree does not necessarily correlate with his-her profession, said Miser. He added he can't see why resources would be moved from the liberal arts into the professional schools.

"I'd obviously like more resources," said Miser, "but I'd like to know the reasons they are being taken away from somebody."

He concluded his criticism saying the external issues "are not seriously studied" in the provost's plan.

Dean Jones said the current enrollment figures in the school of engineering are "as large as ever." He estimated there are 1,500 undergraduate majors, and 400 graduate students.

The faculty responded to increasing enrollments by using research as a buffer, Jones said. He explained research is increased or decreased according to teaching loads.

He noted the school is funded almost $1.7 million from outside sources for service and research for the community.

With a good job market causing increased enrollments in the school of engineering, Jones said he plans to request more resources from the provost.

Industrial Engineering

Miser's department will be increased by only one faculty member. The present staff numbers ten.

Miser said his enrollment has more than doubled, but the faculty growth has not been parallel. The present faculty-student ratio is 12:1, he said.

Miser said when he had asked the dean for seven to eight more positions, the dean "approved the principle."

Civil Engineering

Civil Engineering chairperson Merit White said the two additional positions his department will receive from the provost's plan will be enough for teaching duties but not for all research needed by young faculty for promotion and tenure.

By fiscal year (FY) 1982, the civil engineering department will have increased from 18 to 20 faculty members, according to the provost's plan.

White said there are about 258 undergraduate students, making the faculty-student ratio about 19:1. He pointed out that research work complicates the ratio statistics.

Unlike other disciplines, White said civil engineering cannot have large classes, or large lab sections. The teaching assistants (TA's) are not used to directly teach students, said White. They help out in the labs, under the professor's supervision.

White said the provost's plan

Afro-Am professors want formal apology

The Collegian has received a letter from the W.E.B. DuBois Department of Afro-American Studies declaring the sneering of some faculty at the April 7 Faculty Senate meeting as "motivated by racism."

The gestures came when questions were addressed toward Paul L. Puryear, Vice Chancellor for Academic Affairs; Provost Puryear is black.

The letter is signed by the department chairperson, John H. Bracey Jr., and the associate chairperson, Chester Davis. It was unanimously endorsed by 10 Afro-Am faculty at a meeting of the department Friday, according to Bracey.

The letter states that if the Faculty Senate does not give a formal apology, "it will stand condemned by its silence."

The full text of the letter, and related letters, appear on Page 9 of today's Collegian.

Nutrition program asks for more cash

By JOE QUINLAN
Collegian Staff

The School of Food and Natural Resources' nutrition program yesterday requested its dean, R.S. Whaley, to allocate additional resources into the department.

At a morning meeting with Whaley, 70 students and the five faculty nutritionists told Whaley they believe the program could face elimination unless it receives help from him, Whitmore, or the state.

If the University wants a nutrition department, it must soon allocate five more faculty positions, they told Whaley.

"We know we can't get English professors to teach basic nutrition," they said. "We want to do a good job, and maintain an excellent program. But we can't do it (with the present small faculty, five, and high faculty-student ratio, 50:1).

"A real decision has to be made," a faculty member stated.

There are now 135 nutrition majors, a drop of 45 from last year's 180, said Food Science and Nutrition chairperson Frederick J. Francis. An enrollment quota of five freshmen and five transfers for next semester has been arranged with the admissions and transfers offices at Whitmore.

A set enrollment of 80 will be fixed for nutrition, until resources are increased, he said.

Whaley said the school and department should get together and figure out "where we're going to be five years from now, and then decide" upon the necessary allocations. He stressed to the audience all "criteria" must be considered when proposing allocations.

Whaley noted one hindrance to planning is the current budget situation.

"I don't even know what the department budget is going to be," he said. "No one does."

However, Whaley informed the group that in the provost's plan the School of Food and Natural Resources will be getting additional positions. In the projection breakdowns for fiscal year 1982, Provost Paul L. Puryear lists 10.8 more faculty for Whaley's school.

Nutrition is the top priority division of the school for the first new position and dollar, said Whaley. He added that the other over-enrolled departments will also share the additional allocations.

Hotel, Restaurant, and Travel Administration (HRTA) is probably second to natural resources for reallocations.

Whaley also said he'd rather get allocations from outside the school, since he said all but one of his departments need more resources. He did not name the exception.

When some of the faculty and students asked Whaley if he thought a letter campaign or legislative petition would force the administration to meet FS&N's demands for more resources, the dean replied if they chose this route, they should do it "with class".

A meeting with either state Senator John D. Olver or Representative James G. Collins can be arranged through the dean's office, said Whaley.

Pressure on the legislature could sometimes have negative effects, he warned. He also discouraged any idea of threatening the administration with self-destruction of the department because of the small faculty numbers.

Immediato is no machine

By JOE MAGLITTA
Collegian Staff

In a state which bravely cast its (electoral) votes for George McGovern in 1972, it seems fitting that the president of a national Democrat's organization is a UMass graduate student.

While the National Collegiate Democrats isn't exactly higher education's answer to Tammany Hall, President C. Sherry Immediato has no illusions of being Boss Tweed.

"More and more young people are turned off by the party machinery in Democratic politics. Of course all political organizations are playhouses, but ours is an organization where the leader isn't just a figurehead," Immediato said.

The organization is a collection of 70 clubs spanning 25 states. National membership is about 10,000. Immediato, 20, was elected to a two year term as president last February by the National Collegiate Democrats Committee.

"Before the organization of the Collegiate Democrats, most Democrat clubs were nothing more than a funnel for candidate's literature. Right now we're a political-service group," she said.

As national president, Immediato said she "hits the functions" in Washington about once a month and makes the rounds of legislators to keep them informed of collegiate activities.

"I see myself as kind of an ambassador of good will, communicating with outside groups and providing direction for the other leaders," Immediato said.

Because the organization is not funded by the Democratic party, Immediato said she often spends more than $100 a month of her own money on phone calls, newsletters and office supplies.

Like most chapters across the country, the UMass branch of the Collegiate Democrats relies mostly on small contributions and money raised from speakers.

"We pick up money here and there. In the past we've just sort of floundered along. Of course we have membership dues, but club members end up putting up some of their own money once in a while," Immediato said.

Immediato said her goal as national president is to promote a greater political awareness among students on individual campuses across the country.

"People are a bit reluctant to travel 3000 miles for regular national conferences. The cost and time factor is just too prohibitive for that approach. We are trying to organize on more of a regional level, with particular emphasis on the immediate issues facing students on the various campuses," she said.

While Immediato is national president of the group, she is not president of the 25 member UMass chapter. "I'm just another concerned student with a little louder voice than the others."

"While we're trying to orchestrate party activity on a national level, we've also spent a great deal of time on local projects like trying to get everybody out to vote in the town elections. We were pleased with the turnout in the last election but I still feel we could have done more," she said.

Immediato, a graduate of the University of Wisconsin, said she was not aware of the "shambles" the state Democratic party was in until she transferred to UMass last September. She criticized a heavy dependence on "machine politics" and said despite recent election victories, the party should not become too smug.

"There is still a great deal of work to be done in the state, even in our own first congressional district," she said.

Greeks hear Hite speak about budget

By ROBERT L. DAVIDSON
Collegian Staff

Student Government Association Co-President Jon Hite spoke to the Greek Council last night about today's Massachusetts State Legislature budget hearings.

Hite said Governor Michael S. Dukakis has proposed an allocation of $68.1 million for UMass-Amherst but the administration has requested an allocation of $76.2 million.

Hite and Pinky Batiste, the other SGA Co-president, have also spoken to the Northeast Area Government, Central Area Government, Orchard Hill Area Government and Southwest Assembly about the budget hearings. They plan to address the Sylvan Area Government and the Commuter Collective within the next week.

"We will be explaining why UMass deserves $76 million and not $68 million, why UMass is too good to let die," said Hite about today's hearings.

Hite commented, "We need people to contact their representatives, spend five minutes and write a letter. That five minutes can affect the University next year."

"UMass is too good to let die," Hite added.

Hite said that Paul Parks, Secretary of Educational Affairs, will argue against allocating $76.2 million for the Amherst campus because it has not been given any extra funding for the past two years and he feels it does not need any extra funding this year.

"It's a fallacious argument," Hite said.

In other business, Greek Council Vice-president Brian M. Dingman announced that many committee chairs are now open and that job descriptions for those positions will be available soon.

Brian E. Erwin, president of Pi Kappa Alpha, announced that his fraternity will be installed as the newest fraternity at UMass on Saturday afternoon by national representatives.

FAC bar

A cocktail bar has been set up before Fine Arts Center (FAC) series events this semester in an effort to provide better entertainment, according to David Lombardi, assistant house manager of the Concert Hall.

The FAC obtained a "cultural events" license from the town of Amherst to serve champagne and wine a half hour before shows in the series and during intermission at the center's Concert Hall, Lombardi said.

According to David Letters, FAC public relations director, this new service has provided six student jobs as well as a small money-making mechanism for the center.

Stockbridge wants more SGA reps

The Stockbridge Student Senate unofficially voted last night to support an increase in the number of Stockbridge SGA representatives to two.

Presently, there is one representative elected by the Stockbridge Student Senate representing the Stockbridge School of Agriculture.

Student Senate representative Glen Monroe said there should be one Student Senate representative for every 250 students enrolled in the school. Approximately 600 students are currently enrolled in Stockbridge.

The Stockbridge Student Senate also wants to cut its SGA allocation from $5,000 to $2,500 because it supports Stockbridge activities as well as those of SGA.

In other business a report was presented on the First Annual Stockbridge Homecoming weekend. The event, held April 22-24, features seminars, speakers, a Sunday picnic and the 42nd Annual Bay State Live Stock Classic, to be held in Grinnell Arena.

James Mulcahy appealed for more student involvement in the alumni weekend.

"We still need close to twenty students," he said, "manning registration tables, attending lectures, and guiding tours."

In final business, Kim Peck gave a graduation party progress report. The graduation party will be held Thursday, May 19 at Grinnell Arena. A band has not yet been chosen, but there will be beer, and probably a barbeque. The party is for Stockbridge students and their guests only.

SGA votes against Puryear's axe plan

By BRAD GOVERMAN
Collegian Staff

The Undergraduate Student Senate voted last night to oppose Provost Paul L. Puryear's recommended cutbacks and elimination of some departments at the University.

Puryear's report on the reality of level funding proposed that Asian Studies and Slavic Languages departments be eliminated.

Paragraph four of the Senate's statement read, "Meaningful student input is missing from both the Provost's and the Faculty Senate's reports.

The Faculty Senate report suggested the elimination of the Honor's, Residential College, and Global Survival Programs.

The statement also noted the neglect of the University administration to follow University Governance policies which stipulate the faculty must be represented in academic related matters.

The statement reads, "Clearly, the cutback or elimination of any academic department is a matter of governance, requiring appropriate consultation with all governance units."

Puryear said he does not consider this an academic matter.

According to former SGA President Jay Martus, the Senate's statement will serve no constructive purpose.

"This has been going on for years. Input in an advisory capacity has proven useless.

"The Faculty as a union should play an adversary role not an advisory one. The emphasis should be on student unionization. Our only input in the decision process is at the bargaining table."

Senate Speaker Brian DeLima said the statement only condemns the process by which Puryear's report was made and suggested that governance is not workable because it is not followed consistently.

Senator Kwaku Saunders objected to the statement. "It condemns the Provost by only citing the faculty's position and not the Provost's. It paints a picture of the Provost as a power wielder," Saunders said.

Former SGA co-President Paul M. Cronin said the Provost's report is only a recommendation and his excuse for not going to governance was a time limiting factor.

Senator Richard Baga will talk to Puryear this Friday to get specifics and invite him to attend the next student senate meeting next Wednesday.

In other business, a bill to redefine a Recognized Student Organization (RSO) was finally passed after a year and a half of collecting dust in Senate bluebooks.

According to Senator Adam Auster who proposed the bill, it will now be easier to become an RSO group.

The RSO bill also plugged up loopholes in the old system which in the past were used by some groups to turn a profit for its members, Auster said.

Relax ... all those parachutes you'll see floating in today's afternoon sky over Whitmore is not part of an invasion from outer Mongolia. It is the UMass Sport Parachute Club's campus jump-in.

Between 2 and 3 p.m. the first pass will be made by the jump plane. Four skydivers will exit at 5,000 feet over Whitmore. They will freefall until pull altitude of 2,500 feet is reached.

The ride under canopy lasts about three minutes. The jumpers will land in Hagis Mall, next to SBA.

The plan will fly to La Fleur airport to pick up the second load of four jumpers, and return to make a second pass.

In case of inclement weather or high winds, the jump-in will be held Friday.

Jumpers participating in the action include Ed Thompkins and Kevin Richardson from UMass, Chad Phinney from Amherst, Tom Gilbert as area safety officer, Peter Kramer, David Strickland, Ken Preble and Ken Benson.

Vice-president of the parachute club, Al Atlas, said, "We do the demo to show people that skydiving isn't dangerous, and we have fun doing it."

Atlas said another jump-in is to be held next Thursday. The time will be announced by poster.

A first jump course is taught by the parachute club Thursday night at 7 p.m. in the Campus Center. It includes four hours of instruction Thursday night and two hours of instruction given at Turner's Falls airport, Atlas said.

Students generally make their first jump on that Friday, Atlas said.

The cost of a first jump course through the UMass club has been reduced from $65 to $50. This includes instruction, equipment, the jumpmaster and jump, and a year's membership in the UMass Sport Parachute Club.

should be considered tentative. A lot of analysis on the University ought to take place before the final plan is chosen, advised White.

He said he has made "verbal suggestions" to the dean about reallocations for his department. He said he would like to see four to five more positions for civil engineering. But, he added, he will have to justify his demand with student demand and consider "how things change over the next four years."

Mechanical Engineering

Mechanical Engineering chairperson J. Edward Sunderland said last night the level allocation of 23 faculty for his department will not match the increasing enrollments over the next five years.

A growing number of women students make up the school's present 300 majors. He said the increasing demand for mechanical engineering can be attributed to its versatility in the job market.

Like the other engineering programs at UMass, Sunderland's department has heavy research loads.

He said his faculty are of "extremely high quality" and could go practically anywhere.

The freeze on the salary increases has not helped the situation, he said.

Sunderland added he didn't think the provost's projections were very high.

Electrical & Computer Engineering

Lewis Franks, chairperson of Electrical & Computer Engineering, last night declined to comment about the effects of the provost's plan on his department.

The program will be increased from 18 to 20 members by FY 1982. Franks said there is a rising student demand for courses in his department. There are currently 300 majors.

School of Education

The provost plan does not recommend any cutbacks or additions to the School of Education, yet.

Because this school is coincidentally reorganizing its own departments, the provost plan intends to sit back and see what the student-faculty ratios will be before proposing any allocations.

Dean Mario D. Fantini, who has been dean since December, said a reorganization of his school will be completed this spring. The present clusters will probably not exist next fall, he said.

PIRG endorses Bellotti proposal

By PAT BEINAR
Collegian Staff

Attorney General Francis X. Bellotti's proposal Tuesday asking for $250,000 in state funds to assist local consumer complaint meditation programs in Massachusetts is desperately needed, according to MassPIRG on campus.

Calling the proposal "the most important part of our legislative package," Bellotti pointed out local programs rely largely on donated resources and volunteer efforts.

One central office, such as the Department of the Attorney General, cannot handle all the consumer complaints of the state, he said.

A recent MassPIRG study indicated money spent by the complaint meditation programs return from 5 to 10 times its value in direct refunds and repairs to consumers.

Another PIRG report last month, entitled "The Five Million Dollar Game — A Study of Consumer Complaints in Massachusetts calls for the creation of a state fund similar to that proposed by the Attorney General. It recommends the Attorney General's office stop from handling individual consumer complaints.

MassPIRG Staff Attorney Peter Rider said, "Without regional programs, it is doubful whether the Attorney General's office would ever get out of the consumer complaint business. This proposal shows Bellotti's determination to solve the expensive complaint problem, and his commitment to finding workable solutions."

Although the PIRG report questioned the ability of the Attorney General's office to adequately handle individual consumer complaints, Rider expressed confidence that the office could effectively administer a program which provided leadership and resources to local groups wishing to mediate complaints.

Stephen Morgan, executive director of MassPIRG, observed "It is gratifying to us that the Attorney General has taken the initiative on this issue. We hope that other state leaders will follow suit."

Nutrition program asks for more cash

By JOE QUINLAN
Collegian Staff

The School of Food and Natural Resources' nutrition program yesterday requested its dean, R.S. Whaley, to allocate additional resources into the department.

At a morning meeting with Whaley, 70 students and the five faculty nutritionists told Whaley they believe the program could face elimination unless it receives help from him, Whitmore, or the state.

If the University wants a nutrition department, it must soon allocate five more faculty positions, they told Whaley.

"We know we can't get English professors to teach basic nutrition," they said. "We want to do a good job, and maintain an excellent program. But we can't do it (with the present small faculty, five, and high faculty-student ratio, 50:1).

"A real decision has to be made," a faculty member stated.

There are now 135 nutrition majors, a drop of 45 from last year's 180, said Food Science and Nutrition chairperson Frederick J. Francis. An enrollment quota of five freshmen and five transfers for next semester has been arranged with the admissions and transfers offices at Whitmore.

A set enrollment of 80 will be fixed for nutrition, until resources are increased, he said.

Whaley said the school and department should get together and figure out "where we're going to be five years from now, and then decide" upon the necessary allocations. He stressed to the audience all "criteria" must be considered when proposing allocations.

Whaley noted one hindrance to planning is the current budget situation.

"I don't even know what the department budget is going to be," he said. "No one does."

However, Whaley informed the group that in the provost's plan the School of Food and Natural Resources will be getting additional positions. In the projection breakdowns for fiscal year 1982, Provost Paul L. Puryear lists 10.8 more faculty for Whaley's school.

Nutrition is the top priority division of the school for the first new position and dollar, said Whaley. He added that the other over-enrolled departments will also share the additional allocations.

Hotel, Restaurant, and Travel Administration (HRTA) is probably second to natural resources for reallocations.

Whaley also said he'd rather get allocations from outside the school, since he said all but one of his departments need more resources. He did not name the exception.

When some of the faculty and students asked Whaley if he thought a letter campaign or legislative petition would force the administration to meet FS&N's demands for more resources, the dean replied if they chose this route, they should do it "with class".

A meeting with either state Senator John D. Olver or Representative James G. Collins can be arranged through the dean's office, said Whaley.

Pressure on the legislature could sometimes have negative effects, he warned. He also discouraged any idea of threatening the administration with self-destruction of the department because of the small faculty numbers.

Immediato is no machine

By JOE MAGLITTA
Collegian Staff

In a state which bravely cast its (electoral) votes for George McGovern in 1972, it seems fitting that the president of a national Democrat's organization is a UMass graduate student.

While the National Collegiate Democrats isn't exactly higher education's answer to Tammany Hall, President C. Sherry Immediato has no illusions of being Boss Tweed.

"More and more young people are turned off by the party machinery in Democratic politics. Of course all political organizations are playhouses, but ours is an organization where the leader isn't just a figurehead," Immediato said.

The organization is a collection of 70 clubs spanning 25 states. National membership is about 10,000. Immediato, 20, was elected to a two year term as president last February by the National Collegiate Democrats Committee.

"Before the organization of the Collegiate Democrats, most Democrat clubs were nothing more than a funnel for candidate's literature. Right now we're a political-service group," she said.

As national president, Immediato said she "hits the functions" in Washington about once a month and makes the rounds of legislators to keep them informed of collegiate activities.

"I see myself as kind of an ambassador of good will, communicating with outside groups and providing direction for the other leaders," Immediato said.

Because the organization is not funded by the Democratic party, Immediato said she often spends more than $100 a month of her own money on phone calls, newsletters and office supplies.

Like most chapters across the country, the UMass branch of the Collegiate Democrats relies mostly on small contributions and money raised from speakers.

"We pick up money here and there. In the past we've just sort of floundered along. Of course we have membership dues, but club members end up putting up some of their own money once in a while," Immediato said.

Immediato said her goal as national president is to promote a greater political awareness among students on individual campuses across the country.

"People are a bit reluctant to travel 3000 miles for regular national conferences. The cost and time factor is just too prohibitive for that approach. We are trying to organize on more of a regional level, with particular emphasis on the immediate issues facing students on the various campuses," she said.

While Immediato is national president of the group, she is not president of the 25 member UMass chapter. "I'm just another concerned student with a little louder voice than the others."

"While we're trying to orchestrate party activity on a national level, we've also spent a great deal of time on local projects like trying to get everybody out to vote in the town elections. We were pleased with the turnout in the last election but I still feel we could have done more," she said.

Immediato, a graduate of the University of Wisconsin, said she was not aware of the "shambles" the state Democratic party was in until she transferred to UMass last September. She criticized a heavy dependence on "machine politics" and said despite recent election victories, the party should not become too smug.

"There is still a great deal of work to be done in the state, even in our own first congressional district," she said.

News in Brief

Mass PIRG knocks Ma Bell

BOSTON (UPI) — Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group yesterday called for an investigation by state Attorney General Francis X. Bellotti and the Department of Public Utilities into "predatory and unauthorized" billing practices by New England Telephone Co.

In a statement issued in news conferences in Amherst and at the State House in Boston, MassPIRG said the company illegally is billing many customers $1.50 a month for use of privately purchased extension telephones.

The charge, the group said, is over and above a currently legal $5 a month charge for so-called interconnect device used to link privately owned phones with NET transmission lines.

Carter's energy plan previewed

WASHINGTON (UPI) — President Carter's master plan for energy conservation proposes stiff taxes on gasoline consumers, auto makers and oil companies, according to a draft obtained and summarized yesterday by the Wall Street Journal.

A White House spokesman said the closely guarded plan would indeed be "tough," and Carter might start trying to sell it directly to the public in a televised "fireside chat" Monday evening.

The proposals outlined by the Journal stress pocketbook penalties all along the line, and might be expected to provoke angry protest from consumer groups, labor, auto makers, the oil industry — and Republicans.

Florida Senate rejects ERA

TALLAHASSEE, Fla. (UPI) — The Florida Senate, despite the lobbying of President Carter and Vice-President Mondale, rejected the Equal Rights Amendment yesterday — stifling the ERA for two years and casting doubt the proposal will become the Constitution's 27th amendment.

The 21-19 Senate vote was the second Southern setback the amendment has suffered this year, and proponents conceded they have no prospect of adding a state to the current list of 35 until North Carolina — which turned down the ERA this year — reconvenes its legislature in early 1979. By then, time will be critically short for the ERA, which has seven years from its March 22, 1972, passage by Congress in which to win 38 states.

Gov. cans summer spoils system

BOSTON (UPI) — Gov. Michael S. Dukakis yesterday announced the state will use a lottery system and an additional $1.5 million in state funds to provide jobs to an estimated 5,000 youths this summer.

In announcing the program, Dukakis said the lottery system should eliminate even the hint of patronage which has plagued summer employment programs even in his administration.

Under the plan all the state-funded jobs will be distributed through a lottery system. Dukakis said the lottery will be based on the birthday of applicants, similar to the system used during the mandatory draft.

Dukakis raps new auto scale

BOSTON (AP) — Gov. Michael S. Dukakis threatened Wednesday to have the state take back rate-setting powers from the insurance industry unless companies comply with his demand for a 25 per cent ceiling on auto premium increases.

Dukakis, addressing a State House news conference, labeled rate concessions offered by the industry Tuesday night "entirely unacceptable." He said the proposals merely would give modest relief to some Boston drivers while forcing up premiums for others in the city.

Patty threatened; attorney appeals

SAN FRANCISCO [UPI] — Patricia Hearst, fearful for her life, gave authorities the names of three persons she thought wanted to kill her during her bank robbery trial, her attorney revealed Tuesday.

F.Lee Bailey, urging a three-judge appeals court panel to overturn her robbery conviction, disclosed that she had given the names of Steven Soliah, Kathy Soliah and James Kilgore to the U.S. attorneys in San Francisco and Sacramento.

"We did this in an effort to get them off the streets so they wouldn't kill her, which they tried to do," Bailey said.

He later told reporters that his mention of attempts on her life referred to bombings of the Hearst Castle in San Simeon, Calif., and a Hearst family ranch in Northern California. Miss Hearst was not at either location when the bombings took place last year.

Soliah was arrested the same day as Miss Hearst was captured in San Francisco, and she later testified she had lived with him while she was a fugitive. He later was acquitted on another bank robbery charge. Soliah's sister, Kathy, and Kilgore are still at large.

Bailey and U.S. Attorney James L. Browning Jr. appeared before the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals to argue whether Miss Hearst's conviction should be overturned. Miss Hearst, who is free on $1.25 million bail, was not present in the small, packed courtroom, but her parents were.

The panel took the case under submission.

Bailey argued that errors by the trial judge, the late Oliver J. Carter, were instrumental in the jury's decision to convict her.

He said he had been assured by Carter that the prosecution would not be allowed to question her about events during a "missing year" after the robbery and before her arrest but that the judge reversed himself after she took the stand. Browning argued there had been no such assurances.

Miss Hearst took the Fifth Amendment against self-incrimination 42 times when Browning asked her about events and her associations during the "missing year."

"If this was not intended to poison the defendant, I wonder why Mr. Browning asked the questions," Bailey charged.

Browning noted that Miss Hearst testified freely about her kidnaping by the Symbionese Liberation Army, the bank robbery, a Los Angeles shooting incident a month later and other events early in her underground life.

"Then Mr. Bailey drew the curtain down and she jumped a year to when she was living in San Francisco just before her arrest," Browning said. "The government certainly had the authority to test her credibility by asking her about the missing year."

Top This And Win A Stereo Free

It's Amherst Audio's first and hopefully last funny face contest. Why should stone faces Steve and Farrah bask in the limelight? Just think, you too can be on Television!

Here's how it works: Just bring in this ad with the release form filled out and signed between the hours of six and nine p.m., Mon.-Fri. of this week and Saturday the 16th all day — and wait your turn to be video taped in color for 30 seconds. During which you can distort and contort your face in any way you wish. After the contest is over, our staff of qualified judges will watch all the tapes to select a winner. 1st prize will be a quality stereo system valued at over $400. (Sherwood 7010S receiver, Acoustech 10 Loudspeakers and a BSR Turntable with a Pickering Magnetic Cartridge). The winner will pose for still photographs. There will be appropriate 2nd and 3rd prizes also. To make all this lunacy profitable, the following items will be offered for sale at greatly reduced prices —

RECEIVERS

The Incomparable Marantz 221 5B

At $249.95 there were few receivers that could come close to its eye appeal and brilliant performance in this hotly competitive price range. But, at $159.95 it's a steal (limited quantities)

SONY STR 7065 AM/FM Receiver

Understated specs and seldom matched FM performance made this "The one to beat in the $500 and up price range." The introduction of a new model and our desire to sell the demos makes the low price of $329 possible.

JVC JS-R 300 AM/FM Receiver

This company has never really "taken off" the way they should, why with all this quality and features the JRS 300 receiver should be the one to beat in the under $500 range. Features: 5 band graphic equalizer instead of boring tone controls DLL FM for great reception and power meters for visual display of watts going on. Our low price $348.

Sherwood 7010S AM/FM Receiver

The 7010S is the back bone of our more modestly priced systems. Good FM, reliability and functional styling are the highlights of this unit and our special price of $128 should make you think of taking one home today.

Marantz 2275B FM nReceiver

If the term "Built like a tank" could ever be applied to a receiver this would be it. Behind that brassy faceplate lies a "monster" AMP section ready to dish out whatever it takes to satiate your urges for power in a receiver. List $649.95 Our delivered price $499

Sony STR 4800 SD Receiver with built in Dolby® FM

Any store that stocks both Sony and Marantz has to be on top and with an engineering feat like this machine we're not likely to falter. Last year FULL FM Dolby® in a receiver under $500 was just a dream to many audiophiles, well here it is, power, unequaled quality construction and Dolby® for our low price of $362.

AMPS

Sony TA 2650 Integrated Amplifier

Two years ago hi-fi dealers pleaded for a 45 to 55 watt RMS per channel at 8 ohms — both channels operating at no more than 0.2 per cent THD for under $300 that would offer features and durable construction. Here it is and at our price of $197 it's a bargain that'll go fast.

Sony TA 8650 VFET Integrated Amplifier

Quoting specs here would be a meaningless exercise. VFET technology has produced an amplifier that the old "straight wire with gain" addage can be applied at $1300 list it ain't cheap — but if the best is within your reach — our discounted price and a FREE delivery and installation is on its way.

TURNTABLES

Philips GA 427 Semi-Automatic Belt Drive Turntable

This machine is easily the most popular of its class. A synchronous motor coupled to the two-piece platter has for years been the best way to reduce rumble and the true Bug-A-Boo of record listening, acoustic feedback. Autolift and return to post, built-in stylus force tracking guage, hinged balanced dustcover and woodbase are included at an amazing $82.00 (includes $50 Grado F3+)

BIC 960

Not our favorite but for some uncanny reason it must be everyone else's. A good medium priced turntable changer. Our low price of $118.51 includes a woodbase, dustcover and a M91ED Cartridge.

Philips GA 406 DC Servo Two Motor Automatic Changer

Now here's a great compromise turntable Philips has combined their famous DC Servo motor with a separate motor to operate the automatic operation. Complete with aluminized PVC Base, hinged dust cover and Empire 4000D/1 Cartridge for only $178. (List $284.95)

Woman spaces out!

JAMUL, Calif. [AP] — With her flowing white gown and furs, her "Welcome Space Brothers" sign atop a mountain and $10,000 in bets, Ruth Norman is ready for the flying saucers' arrival this summer.

"Spaceships will be flying in for history's first interplanetary convention," said the 76-year-old high priestess of the Uranius Educational Foundation.

She bought her 65-acre mountaintop 35 miles east of San Diego for $50,000 four years ago as a landing strip for the spaceship fleet. She was directed, she said, by leaders of 32 other planets throughout the universe.

"You think the astronauts landing on the moon was something," she said. "That was a mere minor event when compared to the upcoming visit from inhabitants of the 32 planets later this year."

She bet $6,000 and her followers $4,000 with a London bookmaker, maintaining at least one spaceship will arrive by Sept. 30.

Bernice Richards of Ladbrokes & Co. Ltd. of London said the firm has given the bets 50-1 odds.

Mrs. Norman, called the "Universal Seeress" by her followers and "Spaceship Ruthie" by doubters, says beings from other planets have been talking to her for decades, by means of tape recordings. It isn't clear how she gets the recordings, however.

She and her late husband, Ernest, founded the Uranius Education Foundation in 1954. Uranius is an acronym for Universal Articulate Interdimensional Understanding of Science.

"I have been in constant communication with other planets," she said during a recent visit to the mountaintop in her chauffeur-driven Cadillac. "I often make mental trips to other planets. Those who live on the other planets have the same human form as we do.

Women out in space?

(UPI) — Christine Smith was reading the paper and drinking a second cup of coffee when she decided to become an astronaut.

"I spotted the ad and I didn't hesitate a minute deciding to volunteer," she recalls.

She may never reach space, but NASA tests on her and nine other San Francisco Bay Area women may help researchers find the type of woman suitable for space travel in the 1980s.

What Ms. Smith, a registered San Jose nurse, and the others volunteered for are 27 days of intensive testing at NASA's Ames Research Center.

The 10, chosen from a field of 220 applicants, began the testing this week. During the period they must spend nine straight days of total inactivity in bed to stimulate weightlessness. The women range in age from 35 to 45.

Six of them are married, one is a grandmother, and they have reared a total of 22 children. Two of the women are writers, two are nurses, two electronics technicians, one is a psychological counselor, one a drapery manufacturer, one a banker and one a self-described actress-astrologer.

NASA officials said similar tests have been run in past years and it is doubtful if any of these 10 women will actually every fly in space.

"If they asked for volunteers to actually go into space, I would be first in line," says Carol Pruit of Dublin, one of the volunteers. "I like the unknown."

The space shuttle program is scheduled to make regular flights into space in the 1980s and women are expected to be included, both as crew members and scientist passengers, ala Star Trek.

"We're very interested in the effects of both age and sex on adaptation to spaceflight," said Dr. Harold Sandler, chief medical researcher on the project. "We want to open up the shuttle to as wide a group as possible."

Senate shatters bottle bill...

BOSTON [AP] — The Massachusetts Senate voted to scuttle a bill banning non-returnable bottles yesterday, but the measure's chief proponant says the fight is far from over.

The Senate voted 19-18 against the bill. By its action the Senate reversed a 14-13 vote of last week to send the bill off the Senate Ways and Means Committee for revisions.

Sen. James A. Kelly Jr., D-Oxford, chairman of Ways and Means and the bill's chief supporter in the Senate, made a last ditch effort to save the bill. His motion to table the bill put off any further action on it until Tuesday.

"The bottle bill will be around for awhile," Kelly said, following the session. "I'll use anything I can think of to keep it alive."

Kelly said he plans to propose two amendments to the bill on Tuesday in an effort to gather more support for it. One amendment would phase in provisions of the legislation over several years. Another would provide tax incentives for bottlers who would have to retool.

If the amendments fail, Kelly says he will propose a binding referendum on the issue on a county by county basis. If that fails he said he will try for at least a non-binding referendum.

A referendum to ban non-returnable beverage containers on last November's ballot failed by some 20,000 votes of nearly 2.5 million cast.

Several opponents of the bill point to the possible loss of jobs at bottling and soft drink firms in the state.

...and begins ethics crackdown

BOSTON [AP] — The Massachusetts Senate Ethics Committee is considering whether state legislators should be required to drop outside business interests.

The panel opened hearings yesterday on its job of drafting a code of ethics for the state Senate, 10 days after the Senate expelled a member who was convicted of extortion.

The Ethics Committee had recommended the expulsion of Sen. Joseph J.C. DiCarlo, D-Revere, who now is seeking to regain his seat in a special election.

The five-member panel indicated by its questioning of "ethics experts" that it will study the issue of financial disclosure of outside income by senators — and consider whether their salaries should be raised to exclude other jobs.

The Massachusetts House has created its own Ethics Committee to draft a code but Democratic House leaders have not yet appointed their quota of members and the committee so far is inactive.

The Senate panel, created after the conviction of DiCarlo and former Sen. Ronald C. MacKenzie, R-Burlington, was urged by a member of the Senate leadership Wednesday to probe "no show" senators.

Sen. Allan R. McKinnon, D-Weymouth, a Senate whip, said the committee "should look into people who do not attend Senate sessions as regularly as they should."

Spokesmen for the citizen group Common Cause urged the panel to draft a code that would require legislators' disclosure of finances, limit annual gifts to legislators from lobbyists to $100, reduce conflicts of interest, eliminate outside employment by legislative staffers and prohibit former legislators from being lobbyists for a year after they leave office.

Not even a donkey...

Zelfs een ezel, in het algemeen stoot zijn poot niet tweemaal aan de zelfde steen.
— old Dutch saying

What's all this fuss about a Spring Concert?

Last we heard, Stevie Wonder was coming here to play at the Spring Concert (Collegian, 1 Apr.). But then some lout told us it wasn't true. And if that were not enough, neither Leonard Bernstein nor Fleetwood Starship nor Jefferson Springsteen nor the Beagles nor, for that matter, any of those big rock groups are coming.

What's going on??

David Kantor is supposedly the Executive Co-Chairperson, Concert Master, Chief Bookee, and many other titles of the Spring Concert Committee. As such, he has much to answer for regarding the apparent No-Concert. But in all fairness, he is being attacked for the wrong reasons. After all, it is logically possible that he really may have gone 0 for 500 in contacting groups. And perhaps he really can't help his "uncooperative, condescending attitude". (We can't !!)

First, a couple of points in his favor. When prospects were starting to look grim, Mr. Kantor didn't tell anyone. In taking the full burden upon himself, he certainly demonstrated courage and strength of character. Why bother others with this little problem?

Mr. Kantor also struck a blow for "Student Control over our Lives". Even when things looked grim, he refused to consider bringing in a professional promoter to assure that students would at least get a concert. A Spring Concert should be "a learning experience for all those involved with the planning of a concert". And after all, he reasoned, how could progressive students enjoy the music while knowing capitalist promoters would be making a profit from the concert? Ideology is not just loud noise!

But most of all, we appreciate that Mr. Kantor is an altruist. In last week's story, he noted that he "is working for the pleasure at the end of a concert". Unconfirmed reports have reached us that the hundreds of dollars in salary Mr. Kantor received over intersession will be given to charity.

No, Dave, while we certainly have no doubts about your character, we do question your lack of imagination and judgment. For example, we can understand your reluctance to come to the Senate or your fellow committee members with your problem. They can't be trusted with weighty matters? But why the hell didn't you go to SOP? Not only are they really good at organizing things, but they're very discreet too. They won't even tell students about their union, so they certainly wouldn't have ratted about your concert.

But the stupidest thing you could have done was to let on that no groups were signed. Haven't you ever heard of the Noble Lie? Sometimes it's necessary to lie to people for their own good. You should have kept telling everyone how well things were going. Ah, you say, but what happens when Concert Day arrives and you have no groups?

Improvise.

A little imagination goes a long way. Below are some suggestions about what you could have done, Dave, had you not been so brash. They rely on two Objectively True premises:

1. All rock groups look and sound alike;
2. If people can be induced to believe that they're seeing a "heavy" group, then they actually are seeing that group, even if it is not really there.

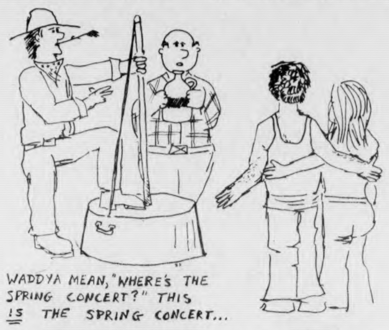
DISCLAIMER: The following are not original plans, but come from exalted SGA politicians who can't afford to be associated with schemes certain legalistic lintpickers might call fraudulent.

PLAN A: This plan requires good sound equipment. But for the $67,000 you had to work with, you could have afforded the best. See, the thing is that at rock concerts the audience usually sits so far away from the performers that they can't see anything but vague body forms anyway. So you hire a few unemployed derelicts, paint them up funny, give them bizarre clothes, and booze'em up. Then while they reel and sway on the stage which is of course located at least 50 yds from the nearest student "not in the know", you simply play tapes of the groups that are supposed to be there. That way, everyone will think they're really witnessing something marvelous. Clever, huh?

PLAN B: Drugs. For $67,000 you can buy a helluva lot of drugs. Just imagine a whole stadium filled with stoned or hallucinating students! That way, students see whoever they want to see. Even Sweet Pie would look and sound like Linda Ronstadt. Good God, Fate would sound like Chicago!! Far out, huh?

Unfortunately, now it's too late for any of these plans.

Ah well, students are a forgiving bunch. Especially the Senate which has now given you $25,000 to set up a "not-so-high-quality" affair. And Dave, you deserve a second chance.



WADDYA MEAN, "WHERE'S THE SPRING CONCERT?" THIS IS THE SPRING CONCERT...

By the way, the above saying translates to "In general not even a donkey stubs his toe twice on the same stone." Maybe both you and the Senate will keep that in mind? Thanks.

Lastly, our own idea for saving Concert Day. How about getting E. Power Biggs to play Bach organ fugues? It might only be classical music, but at least it would be loud.

Never mind ...

Breaking even

About a month ago, I dreamed I won the lottery. It wasn't just a good dream it was a great one. Ever the believer in the metaphysical possibility of the reality of dreams, I set out soon after to buy Mass. lottery tickets at a feverish pace.

When I would win a free ticket, I'd talk myself into believing that I was breaking even; or if I won a few dollars, I of course would buy more tickets with that money. All my money was going to the state and I had myself convinced that I was always "breaking even".

Last week, I spent my last six dollars on lottery tickets. Eight is my lucky number, but I was pretty sure I'd win at least two tickets from my six to make eight and be lucky. (Lottery addicts can talk themselves into anything.)

An elderly gentleman was sitting next to me in the Hatch while I was scraping off my six tickets. He asked where I had bought them because he had never bought one and wanted to try a shot at it. I told him that I had just won two free tickets and had to go back to the store to claim them, so I'd take him to where they were sold.

As I was filling out the back of my cards to claim my "lucky" extra, free tickets, the man bought his first ticket. Before my very eyes, he scraped his ticket and won $1,000. That's right, a thousand.

I should have been clever and said, "Better luck next time," but all I could get out was, "WAAAAHH". Maybe I should have at least kicked him. I didn't think of that until afterwards also. Even lottery addicts can be civilized.

My friend Marianne consoled me with, "Maybe he wasn't a real man after all, maybe he was an angel that was sent because if you had won that money it would have corrupted you." She's right, I have potential corruptability; although I think it would take more than $1,000.

It reminded me of last year when we all were playing Bingo in the dorm. We had been playing all night, I had won a few of the small pots, but of course was hanging on to the end like everyone else for the Big Pot at the end.

It was the last game, the one where you have to fill up the whole board, when a guy came downstairs to get a soda from the machine. Everyone wanted the pot bigger so we coersed him into playing so we could win his soda money too.

You can guess the outcome, that guy won the Big Pot. About twenty dollars in pennies. Most of us threw our pennies at him. (At least we didn't kick him.)

I've slowed down a little, partly because I'm broke, but the incident with the old gentleman hasn't discouraged me. I figure my dream didn't have a date on it and it's still going to happen. Maybe I'll go to Las Vegas; I wonder how much I could get for my mother.

Only kidding, Ma. Addicts are all alike.

School of Ed. faces phase-out

To the Editor:

As noted in Ed-lines, the Dean of the School of Education, Mario Fantini, has proposed a master plan for the reorganization of the School of Education. This plan calls for a phase out of undergraduate education with the exception of programs which are experimental and-or support the graduate program and faculty research. Also of significant notice is the possibility that teacher certification may be difficult to obtain for students in other academic majors.

Dean Fantini, with the support of Governor Dukakis, seems to be saying that teacher training is a function of a state college and not a university.

What does all this mean? It means that we, as students and future graduates, are in trouble. Once again, the university is taking advantage of the student and it is about time we put up a battle. If student apathy is to persist, then we will only be digging our own graves. If students vocalize their objections and formulate strong input, then maybe we can properly shape our education. It is our education not theirs!

A meeting has been scheduled for this coming Friday, April 15 at 11 a.m. in Marks Meadow Auditorium in the School of Education. We urge all undergraduates in education as well as other concerned individuals to attend this meeting.

Dean Fantini has often stated that he welcomes student input in decision making. So it is our duty to formulate sound arguments and proposals.

Take a stance in support of your education! It will make a difference!

'Politics' stifle the issues

To the Editor:

It became painfully obvious to me at the OHAG meeting Sunday night that you, the newly elected officers of OHAG, have lost track of OHAG's purpose. That purpose, which I believe is representative government for all residents of the Hill, is no longer being served by OHAG. Instead, OHAG has become a political science club, which you preside over each week according to Robert's Rules of Order etc. What of the issues, of the residents who trusted to you their hard earned student dollars? The issues are being stifled under parliamentary padding and the people are being neglected.

Now, even the representatives fail to attend these ridiculous "club meetings". I feel that they do not show up because the meetings at which they are supposed to be able to represent their floors, are pointlessly off-track and are difficult to follow when something of interest and importance does come on the floor.

I suggest that you people come down from your high places and take a long look at what OHAG has become. You have the power to help Orchard Hill become an even better place than it is now. You also have the power to ruin Orchard Hill as a viable living area. You are now on the spot. Do the right thing, please.

Letters: The debate over the Puryear Report

Attacks against Puryear racially motivated?

Open Letter to the Faculty From the W.E.B. DuBois Department of Afro-American Studies:

It is with much sadness that we, the faculty of the W.E.B. DuBois Department of Afro-American Studies, are forced to conclude that a substantial portion of the antagonism and hostility directed toward the Chancellor and the Provost by some segments of the faculty is motivated by racism. As a department of individuals who have a long history of involvement in the struggle against racial oppression, we are not surprised at finding manifestations of racism on the campus of a major northern university. What has surprised us is the openness and intensity; the ignorant, irrational and mob-like expressions; the lack of that sophistication and subtlety that we had come to expect from northern 'liberals'.

Two circumstances apparently have served to trigger the more virulent racial hostility of the past few years: the organizing and electing of a union, and the hiring of Paul Puryear as Vice-Chancellor for Academic Affairs and Provost. Let us be quite specific. When the M.S.P. made its first major organizing efforts during 1973-74, our department was most open and cooperative in sending representatives to meetings and in inviting union organizers to discuss union goals and objectives with members of our department, and with other minority faculty. At one of those meetings, we expressed our concerns on the question of union support for affirmative action efforts in behalf of minority faculty and students. We were told quite frankly that we would have to "look out for ourselves," that "if we wanted affirmative action planks in the platform we would have to put it there ourselves," and that the M.S.P. was not going to make any appeal to minorities or even appear to make affirmative action a concern for fear of losing the "red-neck vote." We were shocked less by the existence of a "red-neck vote" than by the fact that it was being openly courted as such. The faculty member who made the remarks about "red-necks" is still at the University and we will not disclose his name since the remarks were made at a closed meeting.

It subsequently became clear that the Union's reluctance to take a forthright position on affirmative action was not just a matter of election strategy. What became increasingly more evident was that the initial impulse toward unionization was in part a response to what the Union saw as the increasing presence and influence of Blacks and other minorities at the University. After further discussion, we took no position on unionization and left to individual discretion the question of involvement or lack of involvement. Some of the Black faculty joined M.S.P., some A.A.U.P., etc. At any rate, the first election resulted in the defeat of unionization.

During the most recent campaign which resulted in the election of M.S.P. as the bargaining agent, our department invited M.S.P., A.A.U.P., and Committee for a Fully Informed Faculty to send representatives to a regular meeting of our faculty on November 5, 1976.

The M.S.P. faculty member's opening remarks indicated clearly his belief that race was a major factor in the impending election. He said that "you people" would be silly not to support an administration headed by Blacks; that we were viewed as more of a social service or welfare program than an academic discipline, and furthermore that Dean "Jerry Allen is like the Godfather and he really loves you people." At this point some members of our faculty asked him to not attempt to read our minds, but to explain the program and goals of the M.S.P. in a manner similar to that of the other representatives. We would make up our own minds as to where our interests lay. We then spent a fruitful two hours discussing the merits of the various positions stated by the representatives. A week after the meeting, our Chairman received a letter reiterating what we viewed as the simplistic nonsense that was expressed at the earlier meeting. Like all junk mail, it was not answered, and was placed in the round file.

At this point we must stage our regret that we did not do more to oppose the unionization of the faculty if for no other reason than to force a discussion of the issues. We assumed, falsely, it seems, that the questions we raised — concerning the ability of a union to influence educational policy, long-range planning, reallocation of resources, and to increase budgetary support, that the M.S.P. could not answer satisfactorily — were being raised in other departments. Apparently they were not. It is now clear to us that if the M.S.P. is writing off our vote because we are Black [we have two white faculty, a number of white adjunct faculty, and began our struggle to become a department with the support of white senior faculty in the English Department] then they were appealing to white faculty to vote for the Union against a 'Black' administration. If this is not the case, the burden of proof is on the M.S.P.

The appointment of Paul Puryear as Vice-Chancellor for Academic Affairs and Provost has unleashed — that is not too harsh a word — some of the most irrational and racist behavior that we have ever seen on the campus of a university. It should be made quite clear that Puryear's appointment received strong support at every level of the search procedure. The Search Committee, deans, department heads and chairmen, Faculty Senate Committee, graduate and undergraduate student groups were overwhelmingly white, as is the Board of Trustees. Obviously someone other than a few Black faculty thought that Paul Puryear was qualified to be Provost. We call your attention to how he was selected.

When the Search Committee had thus presented each candidate to the various bodies concerned and looked at the response of each group to each candidate, Paul Puryear seemed the candidate whose credentials satisfied the most. His name was passed by the Search Committee to the Chancellor who presented his name to the Board of Trustees. The point, we hope, is made: Paul Puryear was not presented to the Board of Trustees as the result of a capricious or arbitrary decision by the Chancellor, but as the one individual who had come through all the concerned groups with the best track record. The appointment of Paul Puryear was to be expected by all who believe that the faculty, students, deans, etc. should have a say in the selection of the Provost.

However, one response to the announcement of Paul Puryear's appointment was an attempt to petition the Board of Trustees to deny confirmation. This effort was as stupid as it was racist. At any rate, it was mercifully shortlived and very narrowly supported. Should anyone doubt that such a petition was attempted we suggest that you ask former Chancellor Oswald Tippo and Dean Seymour Shapiro who were asked to sign it.

Since October a segment of the faculty has treated us to an increasingly cacophonous melody with two themes: [1] that the Provost is not providing leadership at all and [2] that the Provost is making decisions and leading where no one wants to go. A look at the front page of Friday Collegian [April 8, 1977] provides examples. George Ordione says that the proposed five-year plan which calls for S.B.A. to gain fifteen positions is an "emotional spasm" which reveals that, "There is a paralyzing lack of will to manage over in Whitmore." Across the page we find that at a meeting of the Faculty Senate the charge was made that the Provost has done too much, that he has assumed powers and made decissions without proper faculty input.

MSP responds to Afro-Am letter

To the Editor:

The Executive Committee of the Massachusetts Society of Professors is deeply troubled by recent accusations of racism against the faculty union. The MSP continues to be committed to a strong affirmative action program at the University of Massachusetts, as stated in its Constitution and Platform documents.

It is unfortunate that some remarks made at a recent meeting of Humanities and Fine Arts faculty were construed by members of the W.E.B. DuBois Department of Afro-American Studies as having been made with racist intent. We take this opportunity to reaffirm our strong commitment to affirmative action in all respects of University governance.

The official position of the Massachusetts Society of Professors regarding affirmative action was stated in a Position Statement issued January 31, 1977. It includes the following statements:

"MSP is committed to the goal of providing an excellent environment for students, faculty and staff. We believe that vigorous support of Affirmative Action is essential to the realization of this goal. While the MSP recognizes that progress towards the goals of Affirmative Action has been made in recent years through the hiring of women and minorities in faculty and staff positions, we believe that special efforts must continue to be made to consolidate and considerably improve on the gains of the past. Much remains to be done.

"The MSP recognizes that because women and minorities have in many cases been hired relatively recently, they are in a particularly vulnerable position and their interests must be strongly protected. We vigorously oppose tenure quotas, or a tenure "squeeze", and support the idea that Affirmative Action be a positive factor in tenure decisions. In the case of retrenchment, the MSP will demand that Affirmative Action goals be respected."

Racist remarks deplorable

Dear Editor:

Racism in any guise or context is deplorable. The present context of discussion of Provost Puryear's long-range plan is no exception. Racist remarks and criticisms leveled at the Provost in lieu of substantive comments leveled at his plan dignify neither the University nor those who resort to this sub-rational mode of discourse. The undersigned faculty heads and chairmen, and their deans, herewith declare their feeling that the introduction of racism into this extremely important issues does far more damage than any of the implications of the plan itself, and urge their colleagues and students to disassociate themselves overtly from all manifestations of racism at the University of Massachusetts.

Threat to grad students

To the Editor:

It should be clear to most people by now that the Puryear Report is an attack not only upon faculty, but upon graduate students as well. Graduate students will be wounded in three ways by the proposed reallocation of budget priorities.

Most immediately, grads in the departments being eliminated will be without a home. Their academic and financial plans and hopes will be destroyed, delayed, or disoriented. Secondly, the report calls for cuts in many departmental budgets and, as we discovered two years ago, one of the first places cut in a departmental budget is TA-TO-RA funds. For example, Political Science is facing an immediate cut of $6,000 in graduate funding, with similar cuts in future years. This is a drastic attrition in the graduate population of this school. And no one is safe. A department preserved this year may be cut next year — divide and conqueror one at a time. Finally, our graduate education suffers as faculty are cut and others give up and escape to other schools.

Obviously, graduate students need a unified response to this attack. I feel the Graduate Student Employees Union [GSEU] offers an opportunity to respond. Right now we are concentrating our fight for graduate student education on the issues of job security and decent pay. At a meeting at noon on Friday in the Campus Center 805 there will be discussion over how to formulate these types of demands into a coherent response to the Puryear attacks. Come to the meeting and as a unified graduate body we can arm ourselves with a statement of need and purpose and then plan how to act in defending our education, jobs, and lives.

It is our view that the Provost's proposal is just that, a proposal, and we see it as our responsibliity to challenge and question those aspects of it with which we do not agree. We are doing so in writing as requested by the Provost and our Dean. We also intend to respond to the Provost's challenging of one of our tenure recommendations. We are not going to adopt the additude now prevalent among white faculty that damns the Provost for not acting and then dams his actions. The inescapable conclusion is that some white faculty will not accept the leadership of Blacks regardless of their qualifications. By the way, if George Ordione does not want the fifteen positions due to their origin in "an emotional spasm," the Faculty of Humanities and Fine Arts will be glad to have them.

The meeting of the Faculty Senate on Thursday, April 7, was the occasion for the "revolt of the red-nicks." Here the Provost was hissed at and generally treated in a manner that can only be categorized as barbaric, Our memories are not so short and our history much too long for us not to recognize the racist hostility and lynch-mob atmosphere that prevailed. Such behavior is a disgrace, and if the Faculty Senate does not issue a formal and open apology to the Provost, it will stand condemned by its silence. The faculty members responsible — whatever the Senate does or doesn't do — stand condemned by their behavior.

It came as no surprise that at a meeting called by the M.S.P. at noon on Friday, April 8, the Chancellor and Provost were called "running dogs" of President Wood, and that such labelling was warmly applauded. The next logical step for M.S.P. is to dress up it members in white sheets and hoods, and to burn crosses on the grass in front of Whitmore. Those faculty who supported unionization because of some romantic identification with the "labor movement" or because of their self-proclaimed "radicalism" should take a good look at their colleagues. Those who are not ashamed of their racism should state their views openly. Again we are asking that the leadership of M.S.P. make clear its own views in this regard.

We hear a lot of talk about "collegiality" these days. But talk is cheap. The University is in a period of transition with the resultant increases in tension and discord. Such is to be expected. The era of growth for higher education is over and we appreciate the efforts of the Provost to initiate the changes that will help the University adjust to new circumstances. He is as far-sighted as much of the faculty is short-sighted. We are not asking that the faculty agree with the Chancellor and Provost, or that the faculty cease legitimate efforts to assert its influence either through the Faculty Senate or the new Union. What we are demanding is that the Chancellor and Provost be treated with the respect and common courtesy due to them as human beings.

If the University is to survive the immediate crises — budgetary, organizational, etc. — and to move ahead as a sound first-rate institution then there is going to have to be some minimal agreement of purposes and goals. Over emphasizing issues of personality and race will not help. Certainly a university community smugly claiming to represent intellectual leadership and a civilized intelligence does itself no credit by reverting to behavior more appropriate to a racist mob. As a community we can and must do better.

Your Birthday
by Stella Wilder

Thursday, April 14 — Born today, you are not destined to lead an especially exciting life. On the other hand, you can more or less count on leading a secure one. You should be well-geared to success by the time you reach adulthood, for you will begin early in childhood to exploit your talents in such a way that through them you achieve the kind of confidence, faith and determined progress that is extremely well established by your maturity. You make an effort to cultivate a middle-of-the-road philosophy regarding your relationships with other people; if you fail in this, you are quite apt to approach others either too energetically or too timidly -- in either case, losing out on your purpose.

You are a generous person and an exceptionally likable one who should have little difficulty making friends. You try to see life through rose-colored glasses, but you have a natural instinct for truth and honor that keeps you from fooling even yourself. You are well aware of your own limitations and you try never to become involved in the pursuit of goals that would require an attempt on your part to outdistance those limitations. You are not one to be different, whether by design or intuitive accident -- but you should gain much admiration for your high degree of consistency.

You should gain a reputation for having your feet on the ground, even among those who themselves have their heads in the clouds. You may at times fall victim to the rosy promises of those who would see you as more frivolous than it is your nature to be, but for the most part you keep your wits about you and take life as seriously as the situation and circumstances at hand require.

Friday, April 15

ARIES (March 21-April 19) — Security is your aim today. Make it a point to let loved ones know of your whereabouts at all times. Concern yourself with yesterday.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) — Take action that will carry you forward in your drive to the top. Don't hesitate to take another up on an offer of honest gain.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) — You would do well to come to a decision regarding your immediate future without further delay. There are good times on the way.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) — If you can get through the morning without losing your temper, you can count yourself lucky. Frustrations cause irritation and annoyance.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) — Your initial approach to a difficulty in the home is probably the right one. Take a second look at the options open to you at this time.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) — Take both physical and mental action against those who have shown themselves less than friendly toward your new proposals for gain.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) — Although you may dream unrealistically about your distant future, take a sober view of tomorrow; much good can come of caring.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) — Maintain a high level of pride in your work. Otherwise, you may find that your efficiency and effectiveness deteriorate seriously and quickly.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) — Another may attempt to foist products of little worth on you. Take your time deciding what to do about it -- then do it!

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) — It is important to your future success that you go about your work today with more craftsmanship and less tomfoolery than usual.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) — Add the finishing touches to a product just completed. This is a good time for reassessing your chances for success in your present career.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) — There is no room today for the slipshod or the imprecise. You cannot reach perfection -- but you can certainly strive for it.

Friday April 22

So I say to you my friends, that even though we must face the difficulties of today and tomorrow I still have a dream. It is a dream deeply rooted in the American dream that one night, Monday night, a beer will cost thirty-five cents that one night. Tuesday night, a glass of fine wine will cost fifty cents. That one night, Wednesday night, hot dogs for all will be free (as long as they last). This is our hope. This is our faith. This is

Batswomen face URI

By PAT McGRATH
Collegian Staff

The undefeated UMass softball team travels to Kingston today to face Rhode Island. The Rams are untested to date, as their game against the Minutewomen opens up their softball season.

The Kingston team is in for a tough battle as the Minutewomen are coming off a big double victory over Central Connecticut. In a doubleheader over Easter weekend, the softballers showed an inspired team effort to overcome a pesky Blue Devil squad by scores of 2-1 and 7-6. The highpoints of those contests were a superb team defense and strong performances by each of the three UMass pitchers.

Sue Peters, who allowed one hit, one walk, and one strikeout in one inning of relief work in the wild second game of the twinbill, will get the starting nod. She is also the team's leading hitter to date, and her bat will be a mainstay in the UMass lineup.

If Peters runs into any trouble, either senior Gail Matthews or freshman Gail Carter will be able to come in to provide good relief work. Matthews allowed only one hit while going the distance in the first game and she also swings a big bat. Carter allowed six runs in her first varsity appearance, but four were unearned as errors hurt the Minutewomen in the second game. However, she scattered only four hits, and coach Dianne Thompson believes that all of her pitchers are strong.

"If Peters comes through on Thursday, we will be able to set up a pitching rotation of Matthews, Carter, and Peters," said Thompson. "I have three capable pitchers. With a little more experience, Carter and Peters should really come through. I'm very optimistic."

Thompson will go with the same lineup she used in the first game of the season. Carol Bruce will lead off in center field.

Things that Thompson will be looking forward to improving on in the first two outings includes more clutch hitting. The Minutewomen left many runners on base in the doubleheader, as no one was able to come up with the big hit when it was really needed.

UMass is also working on picking up signals and inproving communication when runners are on the basepaths.

"Hopefully it will be warm softball weather on Thursday!" Thompson added. "We did pretty well over the weekend considering the weather conditions, and we should do ever better if the sun is shining."

The JV softball team will be making its season's debut today against the URI JVs.

WHAT'S HAPPENING

Membership meeting for Grad employees

The Graduate Student Employes Union will hold a general membership meeting tomorrow at noon in Campus Center 175. Among the topics to be discussed during the two-hour meeting are the UMass budget crisis and its effects on graduate education, the recent five-year plan released by Provost Puryear, and the newly proposed GSEU platform. Departmental grievances will also be heard with the hope that GSEU can more comprehensively deal with whatever problems graduate students encounter. All GSEU members and interested graduate students are urged to attend this important meeting.

'Let My People Go,' tonight in CC 917

There will be a screening of the film "Let My People Go" today at 8 p.m. Campus Center 917 free.

The footage consists of many rare shots of Hitler's Germany and the efforts of Jews to resist, flee and build a homeland in Palestine.

There will be a Holocaust Memorial Ceremony dedicated to the Jews and Jewish communities of Europe which were destroyed by the Nazis and their collaborators tonight at 7:00 in Campus Center 905.

Health Services to offer summer plan

University Health Services will again offer prepaid health services to students and their dependents from the Five College area who will be in the Amherst area during summer. The same comprehensive package of services will be offered as during the academic year. The prepaid package of services covers the period from June 1 through August 31. The deadline for enrollment for coverage for the entire summer is June 15. The fee is $35 for students and an additional $35 for their dependents.

Students enrolled in the summer session and pay a health fee as part of their service fees can pay an additional amount to obtain coverage for the entire summer period. Care will also be available on a fee-for-service basis. Questions regarding the Summer Health Plan can be answered by the University Health Services business office, 549-2671, ext. 170.

Larry Dicarla part of politics practicum

Boston's youngest city counsellor, Larry Dicara, will speak before the College Democrats at 4 p.m. in Campus Center 905. He will be on WMUA's "Off the Hook" program at 6:15 p.m. and at a local politics practicum in Pierpont Hall at 7 p.m.

Batsmen bombed; face Chiefs today

By FRAN SYPEK
Collegian Staff

The UMass baseball team will be trying to snap a three-game losing streak this afternoon when it travels to Springfield to play Springfield College in a 3:00 game.

Yesterday's exhibition game with the Eastern League Holyoke Millers didn't help team morale any, as the professionals feasted on collegiate pitching enroute to a 15-2 win at Lorden Field. Coach Dick Bergquist wasn't too concerned with the loss, however, saying that he was more worried about how Saturday's doubleheader loss to Northeastern and Tuesday's 4-3 setback to Boston College would affect the team.

"Those games were not good for team morale," Bergquist commented, "They were good games if you were an uninterested spectator, but I can't say that I was."

Millers second baseman Gary LaRocque set the stage for a five-run first inning when he sent Jerry Erb's second pitch over the right field fence. Four more Millers crossed the plate the frame as they sent nine men up to bat.

But Holyoke came up with three runs in the second, four in the third and three more in the fourth to take a 15-0 lead over the Minutemen. The Brewer farmhands had a total of 16 hits off four Minutemen pitchers.

"I'd like to play them again," said Bergquist. "It was a good experience. The players were a little tight out there and it showed. But they showed they could play with a team that's a little level about them."

The most encouraging part about the game was how the Minutemen settled down after falling so far behind. Dave Stroller, Dave Tewhill, Tom Nigro and Pete Rankowitz held the Millers scoreless over the final five innings, allowing only three hits.

Both UMass runs came in the ninth inning. Jim Cullen led off the inning with a base hit and was safe at second base on a fielders choice by John Czerapowicz. Millers shortstop Ed Romero drew an error on the play. Bavel Cummings singled to load the bases and Cullen came home when McEvilly walked. The second UMass run was driven in by Dale Stone on a fielder's choice.

Paul Abramowicz had two hits for the Minutemen, which were the only two they could muster until the ninth.

With that game behind them, the Minutemen will be hoping to get back onto the win column against the Chiefs. Bergquist will send junior right hander Tom Nigro to the mound.

"Springfield has excellent pitching and I'm concerned about it," said Bergquist.

The Minutemen face UNH in a doubleheader in Durham on Saturday before returning home on Monday for a make-up game with AIC.

Netmen greet Techmen

By MIKE SMOLENS

The problematic UMass doubles will be the key to how well the men's tennis team performs today against an undefeated MIT on the Boyden courts at 3:30 p.m. Stagnant UMass doubles could drop the Minutemen's record to 1-2.

The doubles teams showed their incompetence last Friday by losing all three matches to Tufts.

"MIT doesn't worry me," said UMass coach Bill Brown about today's match, "I'm worried that we'll beat ourselves."

Brown lost a lot of sleep last weekend thinking about the 3-3 tie with Tufts that turned into a 6-3 nightmare at the end of the doubles competition. The first doubles team of Adam Rosen and Alan Green, in particular had Brown tossing and turning.

"I worried about them reaching their potential," Brown said. Rosen and Green didn't come close to reaching their potential against Tufts, according to Brown. The UMass duo lost its first set 6-0, and went on to lose in three sets against a team that even the Tufts coach said should have lost.

The UMass tennis team may have the best singles lineup Amherst has seen in years, but its doubles erratic performance seems to be following tradition. Inconsistent doubles have plagued the tennis team for years and it doesn't look as if the Minutemen will break that tradition this spring.

If UMass doubles play does not improve against MIT, Brown will "give serious thought to switching doubles pairings."

Last Friday's match may not have been the best time to judge UMass doubles, according to senior Barnaby Kalan, who plays third singles.

Last year MIT defeated UMass, 6-3. Brown expects MIT to be equally tough this season, but at this point he is more concerned with his own team's weakness than the opponent's strength.

Gorillas gun past Green

By BEN CASWELL
Collegian Staff

The UMass lacrosse team took its time getting out of first gear yesterday, but when it finally began to move the result was a swift cruise past Dartmouth College and on to a physically-punishing 14-9 victory.

The Big Green of Dartmouth was, by no means, in neutral as it came on head and stick first against the swifter and more accurate passing UMass team.

Dartmouth attackman Jeff Hickey opened the game's scoring at 1:31 of the first period. Hickey took a pinpoint pass from attackman Steve O'Neill behind the UMass goal while cutting across the center in front. UMass goaltender Don Goldstein could not react quick enough as Hickey's shot found the far corner of the net.

Garber's Gorillas evened the score 1:02 later when attackman Mickey Menna connected on his first of four goals for the day. Menna fired a hard, high shot from about 30 feet out on the right which Dartmouth freshman goaltender Charlie Moore never even had a chance to move on.

The Big Green then jumped ahead to what would turn out to be its largest lead of the day when it hit on three goals in less than one minute.

Kevin Young blasted a hard bounce shot by Goldstein at 8:43 with the assist again going to O'Neill. Hickey then scored unassisted from the center at 9:22. Midfielder Ray Gladue scored just 15 seconds later when he dodged two UMass defenders out in front before beating Goldstein to his left.

UMass attackman Jeff Spooner then put himself in the driver's seat as he assisted twice and scored once to bring UMass even with Dartmouth at the end of the first quarter, 5-5. Menna scored again followed by scores from Chuck Smith, Randy Krutzler, and Spooner's score. O'Neill got Dartmouth's other tally in the period.

At this point the game was a tough defensive battle with much aggressive hitting at the midfield positions and in close around the net.

Garber's Gorillas then opened things up for good in the second period as they scored five times compared to the Big Green's none. Kevin Patterson finally got on the scoreboard for UMass at 6:50 of the second period when he fancy-footed and stick-worked a behind-the-back shot past Big Green goaltender Moore with the assist going to midfielder Vinnie LoBello. The play began with defenseman Ken Michaud making a long run upfield after making a good loose ball scoop in the UMass defensive zone.

Menna, John Reardon, Spooner and Patterson again scored the other UMass goals in the second period. Menna brought the ball in all alone from the midfield line, dodged past three Big Green defenders, and bounced a shot past Moore from intight while being knocked down. Spooner made a neat steal to set up Reardon's score and then pounced on a loose ball himself to capitalize on a Dartmouth College error following a good ride (forechecking) by UMass offenders.

Dartmouth would then get no closer than four goals away when midfielder Bruce Taylor scored at 3:01 of the third period while being closely covered by UMass defenseman Wayne Ament.

"They came to play," said UMass coach Dick Garber after his team's struggle-filled victory. "In New England lacrosse we are the big game for all these teams now," continued the coach.

"On a lot of shots we hit the pipe or just missed the cage," said Garber, "I guess that's been our partial story so far this season. We missed too many opportunities, but you just have to go back out there and do it. I kept telling the guys, don't get down on yourself."

UMass' record now moves up to 3-2 while Dartmouth's record drops to 2-3. Garber's Gorillas will play at home again this Saturday at 2:00 p.m. versus Rutgers University, the seventh ranked team in the nation.

Ovalteam overpowers Rams

By MIKE BERGER
Collegian Staff

Aided by summer like temperatures and humidity, the UMass men's track team for the second week in a row convincingly overpowered URI, 99-55, in dual meet competition held yesterday at Derby track before an estimated 100 onlookers.

As they did last week against Holy Cross, Ken O'Brien's 4-1 ovalteam went over the 90-point barrier. Twelve first place victories combined with four nine-point sweeps highlighted the meet. Again depth was the key as the trackmen amassed nine seconds and twelve thirds in comparison to the Rams' seven and four second and third place finishes.

For the second meet in a row, O'Brien's men were not shut out in any event. The field events produced 43 points while the running events provided the winning margin with 45. Again, the leading scorer of the day was sophomore weight man Ron Melkonian who garnered first places in the shot put and the discus and placed third in the hammer.

Freshmen and first year men played an important part in the victory as they scored 20 points in total. An all-freshmen group of Bob Murphy, Mark Dale, Billy Conant, and Mike Delaney combined their sprinting talents and good handoffs to win the 40-yard relay with a time of 43.9, five-tenths of a second behind the freshman record.

Conant, Jerry Herman, and Rich Hoag swept the 220, giving the ovalteam a total of 15 points in the sprints which is supposedly the weakest part of the team.

Actually the meet was much closer than the score indicates as after the 10th event, UMass held a three-point lead, 49-46. URI came out strong with eight points in the hammer while Ron Melkonian kept UMass from being shut out with a third place.

But the ovalteam bounced back with one of four sweeps as freshman Rick Brown, Ron Williams, and senior Toney Pendleton combined for nine points in the broad jump, giving UMass the lead, 10-9. For Brown, his 22' 3 3-4" victory was his personal best while for Williams, his second place was one of three events he was to score in. Williams placed third in the high jump and third in triple jumps with jumps of 6' and 42' 4½ respectively.

With victories in the 440 relay and the shot put, UMass jumped in front, 21-11, after four events and continued the lead through the mile as sophomore Mike Quinn and freshman Bob Martin placed second and third respectively with 4:13.7 and 4:16 times.

Marten's victory, with a time of 48.6, combined with Fran O'Keefe's third place, recaptured the lead at 35-33. Following this, Bruce Parson, who was to score six points during the meet, captured the triple jump at 44' 9½."

Rhode Island came back in the 100 to garner eight points to close the lead to 45-41 with freshman Ozzie Williams keeping UMass from being shut out with third with a time of 10:5. Following the javelin, which saw the Rams take first place with UMass' Bob O'Neil and Jim Golonka taking second and third, the ovalteam finally broke out.

A cynic's eye view

There has been much change in the world of sports in the past decade or so, and many of these changes have been for the worse. Expansion of leagues and schedules for their monetary benefit to team owners, the discovery that players take drugs, and the plethora of bargaining agents representing athletes are just some of the occurrences that have caused a creeping disenchantedness in many followers of fun and games. To discover exactly how far this discontentedness has crept over you, merely answer these eight multiple-choice questions that comprise the "Cynicism Test for the Enlightened Sports Fan."

1. When Babe Ruth raised his arm and pointed deep into the centerfield bleachers during the Yankees-Cubs 1933 World Series, he was ...

A. Doing a commercial for Right Guard.

B. Making an obscene gesture at his bookie.

C. Hailing a taxi to beat the traffic out of the ballpark.

D. Shifting the blame for "cutting the cheese" to a fan.

2. Why did Dr. James Naismith invent the game of basketball?

A. He was a quack.

B. He wasn't smart enough to discover Relativity.

C. He had a secret fettish for sweaty people.

D. His peach crop failed, and he needed a way to unload the empty baskets.

3. Half-price "Family Nites" at Red Sox games mean ...

A. The attendance figure that appears in the box score of next day's newspaper will be padded.

B. A 12-game homestand featuring the Toronto Blue Jays, Milwaukee Brewers and Seattle Mariners.

C. It's September and the Sox are 20 games out of first.

D. Mafiosos will be admitted at reduced rates.

4. A between period's guest is ...

A. Some sucker who doesn't know that Johnny Pierson can't hold an intelligent conversation.

B. Some schmuck that the coach kicked out of the locker room.

C. Some turkey who can't afford to buy a watch.

D. Some yo-yo who's trying to promote his new book, "My December Affair with a Hockey Puck."

5. Why does O.J. Simpson run through airports?

A. He hates signing the autograph books of young children.

B. He's trying to submit his "football card" before the deadline.

C. He's doing speed.

D. He was out drinking the night before and now he's forgotten that the Bills are taking a bus to the game.

6. The playing surface of a basketball court is 90 feet long because ...

A. They couldn't find one more compact.

B. Otherwide there wouldn't be room for the press table.

C. The players would go on strike if they had to run any greater distance.

D. It was supposed to be 100 feet, but it was constructed by the same contractors who built the UMass library.

7. Why did Diego Segui start the Seattle Mariners' maiden game?

A. Darrell Johnson bet on the California Angels.

B. Segui is part-owner of the Mariners.

C. Johnson wants to manage in Pawtucket again.

D. Segui has proof positive that Johnson took part in the JFK assassination.

8. Edelstein wrote this column because ...

A. He saw it in this week's Valley Advocate.

B. Nobody would listen to him recite these insipid views.

C. He couldn't formulate a coherent idea.

D. It's the only way he can get his picture in the paper.

Bruins win, 6-2

BOSTON (UPI) — Bobby Schmautz, who had three goals in a first-game victory, scored twice last night to lead the Boston Bruins to a 6-2 win over the Los Angeles Kings and a 2-0 advantage in their Stanley Cup quarter-final series.

The two teams play again Friday night in Los Angeles.

Terry O'Reilly, Jean Ratelle and Gregg Sheppard had a goal and an assist each. Stan Jonathan got Boston's first goal as the Bruins skated to their seventh straight victory dating to March 26.

Los Angeles winger Tommy Williams spoiled Gerry Cheevers shutout with a power play goal 14:11 into the third period after Boston had taken a 6-0 lead. Marcel Dionne added a tally with 31 seconds to play.

In two games against Los Angeles, Schmautz's first five shots on net were goals.

THE INIMITABLE JEEVES
GOOD HEAVENS JEEVES
By P. G. Wodehouse
Penguin Books, Inc.
$1.95 paper

By Paul Yanowitch

It is a rare pleasure indeed, to find a writer who is able to continually amuse the reader, regardless of his-her age, sex, background, or number of books read of the same style and substance. While I remain sceptical as to the existence of such an animal, I do know that P. G. Wodehouse comes very close.

Pelham Grenville Wodehouse died on February 14, 1975, at the ripe old age of 93, and in that long life, his prodigious pen produced 96 works, covering the gamut of literary forms. From his fertile and creative mind came plays, short stories, novels, verses, lyrics, mysteries and musical comedies.

Wodehouse had a style all his own, one that was both worthy of imitation, and yet impossible to copy. His writing was fancy and free, constantly flowing, but it is rare for the reader to get bogged down in lengthy descriptions or character studies, for one quickly grows to know and like all Wodehouse's characters. It is a style that quickly captures the reader, and pulls him along, amidst a few chuckles, laughs and guffaws, but never proves too serious and overwhelming. His subjects are fanciful and light, and his plots poke fun at the very institutions that support our society.

The books listed above are only two in a series concerning the lives and adventures of the harmless rogue, Bertie Wooster, and his inscrutable man-servant, Jeeves. Bertie Wooster is a pompous, rich bumbling, hapless, Jerry Lewis type lovable Englishman, who earnestly believes in such liberal causes as marriage, golf, dating persons of a lower status, and drinking. It is to his credit that he relies on "'he ol' Wooster intelligence," to support his endeavors, for this trademark of the flawed family is palpably lacking. One cannot help but feel for this fool as he roams around the English countryside in his ill fated attempt to lead the life of a genuine upper class aristocrat. However, he is not bright enough nor is he genuinely interested in pursuing such a life. It seems that Bertie is more interested in watching the fourth race at Eaton Downs with a Scotch on the Rocks, hand-delivered by a beautiful maiden in distress. Instead, Bertie spends his weary life falling in and out of the graces of his stodgy, haughty, stuffy, condescending yet gloriously aristocratic aunts and uncles Jeeves, on the other hand, is the key to the stories. He is unflappable, inscrutable and obviously, incapable of error. He patiently toils at his masters side, making sure that Bertie does not venture into the world with purple shirts and pinstripe pants, get "hooked," by his "dragon" of an aunt into marriage with some horrendous woman, or be left to chaperone a remonstrant child at a neighbor's estate.

These volumes consist of short stories relating the trials and tribulations in the life of young Bertram, and the subsequent master plans by Jeeves to rescue his inept master. Each new adventure brings a new and creative solution by Jeeves, and in this sense the stories border on mysteries, the reader anxiously attempting to second guess the masterful Wodehouse.

So, if you ever need to be entertained in grand style, without being caught in a book with a great message or moral, then pick up some stories, plays, novels, or whatever, by Wodehouse. It's a treasure, by any standard.

A Conversation with ALAN LUPO

By Joe Mahoney

With Liberty's Chosen Home, Alan Lupo has begun to fill a void. In all the scholarly work that has emanated from Boston, there has yet to be a modern history of The City. That is, until Liberty's Chosen Home appeared early this year.

Lupo, who graduated from UMass in '59 and penned his first stories at The Collegian, unwraps Boston and all its messy wounds for all to see.

Civic violence is nothing new in Boston, Lupo writes. To make this point clear, Lupo presents a detailed history of the city since its days as a British colony and establishes that the militant resistance to desegregation of the schools was only a continuation of Boston's violent history.

But Liberty's Chosen Home is not just a history; it is an insightful account of how the city is struggling to survive today, struggling with an anti-urban Supreme Court, struggling with hostile financial institutions, struggling with racial animosity. One puts down the book with an enhanced understanding of the dynamics behind the crisis of the big city in modern America.

As for the reportage, it is alive and vividly graphic, so much so that at times the words will jump right off the page. Like two other great Boston spawned writers — syndicated columnist Mary McGrory and Village Voicer Nat Hentoff — Lupo's writing is imbued with compassion for people.

For a sample of Alan Lupo, pick up a Tuesday or Thursday edition of The Boston Evening Globe and turn to page three. Or, just read this interview conducted in his Boston office last week.

J.M.

You point out in your book, Mister Lupo, that the court to desegregate the schools in Boston does not apply to the suburban schools which are nearly all white. Many suburban towns have turned down voluntary METCC programs that costs nothing and suburban zoning boards always seem to block any low income housing developments. Now the Supreme Court has just OK'ed such rejection of low income housing providing it isn't discriminatory. We know that the effect if not the intent of their zoning laws is to prevent low income housing that might bring with them poor minority families. How will this latest Supreme Court ruling translate for the cities?

A.L.

It just makes an already intolerable burden more difficult. The Supreme Court's ruling may be legally defensible but it's morally insane. Your question is an accurate one. It says: The Supreme Court seems to be saying it is alright for a suburb to keep out low income people — and it's OK to do this just as long as you can show that your reason was in the interest of preserving toads, green gress, fields and blue water. Every suburban politician will now run to the zoning books and make sure that the snob zoning regulations they carry fulfill Supreme Court requirements.

I think that's one of the most disastrous court decisions since the Dred Scott case.

J.M.

Do you feel that public confidence is now growing in the desegregation process and that the so called white flight trend has begun to wane?

A.L.

First of all, I don't know if there really was a white flight trend in Boston. Secondly, it depends on how you define it. If you define it as white people rushing out of the city like so many lemmings then there wasn't a white flight trend. If you define it as white people getting their kids out of school then there was a white flight. Whether it's continuing at the same pace I have no way of knowing. I do know that we have a non-white majority in the schools. Now that doesn't necessarily mean very much now. But if the non-white majority continues to grow as it has in many other cities then it defeats one of the points of desegregation and it again shows the need to desegregate on a metropolitan basis.

For the second part of your question about confidence in the system, I think that in those schools where the administration, the parents and the kids have been deeply involved, there is more confidence in the desegregation process. And those schools that have tried to do business as usual as public schools, there's probably been little or no confidence in the desegregation system. Phase I was a disaster. Phase II brought a lot of promise and potential. And ironically the Boston schools which have needed this kind of reform for so long had to have a desegregation order — Phase II specifically — which brought about the potential for that kind of reform.

J.M.

Hasn't the media perpetuated distortions in their coverage of the desegregation process by largely ignoring the federal court findings of a deliberate conspiracy on the part of the Boston School Committee to keep the schools segregated, and by focusing on what they often call forced busing.

A.L.

No, I don't think so. It depends on which media you're talking about. The Globe is the piece of media I am most familiar with because it's the one I've worked for since I've been back in Boston. The Globe cannot be accused of avoiding the issue of how the city avoided for so many years peaceful desegregation. The Globe has continually pointed that out since before the Racial Imbalance Act in the early 1960's.

I don't think The Herald has been as careful as The Globe in this. Television does with the desegregation crisis as television does with any crisis. If there's a crisis, television rushes to it. If ther's violence, it's there. Occasionally, you'll find a film feature on television which talks about some of the good things that have been happening. Too often, you don't.

J.M.

Does there now exist a brand of political leadership capable of uniting the city's white and black working class?

A.L.

I don't know if that's possible in the cosmis sense. I don't know if any politician, anywhere in the United States who can build that bridge.

Even Martin Luther King, who was one of the most competent at it, was unable to build a bridge as well as he wanted to. God only knows what he might have been able to do. Maybe John Kennedy could have. But we'll never know that either.

There are issues around which white and black and Hispanic and Oriental have coalesced in this city. Before busing, I saw white people from Southie and black people from Roxbury get together to work with people from East Boston to work against Logan Airport expansion, to fight highways. Now whether these kinds of coalitions can happen again after busing is a question that cannot be given a simple answer. My off the top of the head answer is yes, they can happen, they are happening especially in the schools. There are people — Fair Share is an example — people with different backgrounds getting together to fight for common causes.

But there is also a scar on the city. And it's not unlike the scar the Irish carried from the 1800's right up until now — that terrible scar of mass discrimination against a bunch of people, and a scar that was made more raw sporadically by violence perpetrated by one group against another. We now have more scars to bear and whether those scars can be healed over by groups is something that not even a prophet would dare to predict. And I'm no prophet.

> "I'll tell you one thing:
> Thank God I went to UMass > and not Harvard."

J.M.

You seem to have a somewhat fatalistic view of the city's racial bitterness, that the crisis proportions that it reached were inevitable.

A.L.

I don't know if I was fatalistic. I think I was realistic. It struck me as I was doing the history and covering the busing situation on the street and hanging around with the mayor's people in the backrooms — it struck me that busing was the perfect symbol of what the city had been going through for 150 to 200 years. The city had been marked not by its liberalism, but by its parochialism, its insularity, its racial hatreds, its ethnic hatreds.

I took part in some of it. So I know. As late as the '40's and '50's. All these people were screwed. That was the pitiful part of it, you see. They were all fighting for crumbs. Each new so called reform often meant less power and less control over our own destinies.

So when court ordered busing came along — which was necessary because the school committee screwed up — to deal with what had been forced segregation, this was yet another threat to the fragile power that the ethnic groups had been able to maintain. So what happened was inevitable. We've always been dumping on one another. And we continue to do so. And instead of Yankee firefighters beating up on Irish mourners at a funeral in 1834, it was white kids throwing rocks at buses and black kids retaliating.

J.M.

What will be the future direction of the city?

A.L.

First of all, what do you do with a city that is so hard pressed for money that it's talking about doing away with the small constructive things of the last ten years. The community schools. The little city halls. Now there's a danger we're going to lose all of that.

And it raises larger questions. Like, who runs, the city? Well, Abe Beame in New York knows who runs his city—it's the banks. And Kevin White is finding out who runs his city—it's the banks. And I'm not anti-banking. Some of my best checking accounts are in banks and I even have friends who work for banks—that shows you how liberal I am. But I really worry when the democracy or the republic is controlled to such a degree by short term loans. I just don't think that's right.

When you look at all of Boston's problems — the recial animosity, the fiscal crisis, an old school system, a Supreme Court that's letting the suburbs go scot-free, a governor who wouldn't support an expanded METCO program, a Carter administration which has shown no real understanding of urban problems — you do not get an optimistic picture.

And Boston, despite all that, has a shot at making it because Boston is a small, manageable and has a tradition and is liveable and has still a fairly progressive administration and a fairly good quality of candidate for mayor. But that's not enough.

J.M.

Will Boston ever become liberty's chosen home?

A.L.

There's a quality of goodness of people here that could make Boston liberty's chosen home. I really believe that, without being corny at all. There are too many good people to sell the city short. But they can't do it all. They need federal attention, help from the state, cooperation from the suburbs. And if they don't get that almost every community that depends on this city is going to go down the drain. It will take 50 years for it to happen to some places and it will only take 10 years for it to happen to some other places. But it's only a matter of time. People in the suburbs are only kidding themselves if they think resisting low income housing and voluntary integration programs that they are going to preserve a better quality of life, just as the Boston School Committee was kidding its constituency all through the 60's about

Wolff On Wharton

A FEAST OF WORDS — THE TRIUMPH OF EDITH WHARTON
By Cynthia Griffen Wolff
Oxford University Press
415 pgs. illus. $15.95

By Lisa Melilli

There in the photo is a shy little girl with sad, serious eyes standing next to her mother — not too close. She bites her lips; her hand is ducked away in the pocket of her dress. She stands a bit aback from her mother hiding her seriousness for her mother would not approve. Little girls shouldn't be that way. It's "not nice," she would say.

Next to this is a second photo. The little girl has grown into a woman of maturity with eyes showing sparks of determination, pride, gregariousness — and the same seriousness from her childhood days. She's ventured from behind her mother and has engaged in a feat not only considered "not nice" by her mother, but also by the late nineteenth century society she lives in. She's engaged in a money making enterprise few women of her day would have even thought of doing. It's "not nice" really for a woman to be an author. But Edith Wharton not only produced classics of her day but of the American literary heritage: House of Mirth, Ethan From, Custom of the County, Summer, Age of Innocence. A feast of words which were not only the triumph of Edith Wharton, the independent, fearless woman of her day, but also depict the psychological development within this author. These works show clearly the process of maturity within this woman to rid herself of that demanding, overbearing, restrictive mother and enabled her to achieve her fullest creative potential.

It is this triumph and growth of Wharton as woman and author which Cynthia Griffen Wolff successfully and eloquently taps in Feast of Words. Through careful analysis and insight of documented events in Wharton's life and art, Wolff outlines for the reader the progression of Wharton's psychological development. In Feast of Words, Wolff offers two resources of knowledge: Wharton's personal growth in the events in her life and more importantly literary criticism of Wharton's work.

When one first looks at Wharton's place in time and in the society in which she lived, a puzzle appears. Being of the wealthy class through birth and then marriage, where both father and husband never had to work for their livelihood, Wharton appears to be destined for a life of leisure. Why did Wharton write? It is this puzzle which Wolff sets out to solve.

What Wolff finds is the shy, inhibited little girl leading a protected childhood, suppressed by the vivacious and domineering Lucretia, her mother. It was a struggle into adulthood until Wharton finally breaks from her mother and becomes her own person. Wolff finds the sexually inhibited wife who suffers from illnesses spurred on by this inhibition and the emotional uncertainty of being trapped in an unhappy marriage. This inner conflict increases until she finally finds a passionate lover in middle age, and soon after breaks from her marriage with Teddy. Wolff finds the successful author a leader in women rights as well as a leader in American literature. Wolff finds the Wharton who triumphantly learns to use words to confront and come to terms with her inner self.

In a feast of words, Edith Wharton finally finds herself and in her Feast of Words, Cynthia Griffen Wolff finds that author's search and final discovery of the real Edith Wharton. Both "feasts of words" are well worth your time.

Words On Woolf

VIRGINIA WOOLF — A CRITICAL READING
By Avron Fleishman
John Hopkins Press
232 pgs.

By Cheryl Sreiberg

With the evergrowing popularity of Virginia Woolf in the seventies, there naturally has emerged an increasing number of critical studies — too many of which have tried squeezing all of her fiction into a single category of their choice. However, Avron Fleishman, an English professor at John Hopkins University, has recently published a book entitled Virginia Woolf — a critical reading, which stands out to be a highly intelligent, searching study of her nine novels. He digs beyond the surface of both her novels and her life and discovers a brilliant writer, capable of integrating her rich classical background with her own life experiences to create nine novels, each experimenting with a unique style and structure and yet each adding a block to a "shared system of symbols and images."

Avoiding as much outside material as possible, Mr. Fleishman reviews each novel as an independent unit, referring to the original sources only to back his ideas and arguments. Throughout, he refers to the "Woolfian imagination" with its highly experimental "metaphoric construction". He describes The Waves as a "striking stylistic innovation" or Between The Acts as "a synthesis of fiction and drama, of contemporary satire and literary parody of psychological modern tale and aesthetic fantasy."

Certainly for those readers who have enjoyed Woolf or those wishing to understand her through a different perspective, Mr. Fleishman's compact study would be worth reading.

THE SEA BIRDS ARE STILL ALIVE
Toni Cade Bambara
Random House
208 pp $7.95

By Patti Rosenberg

Any evaluation of Toni Cade Bambara's new work implicitly takes a stand on the issue of "politics vs. art." It would be simplistic to suggest that a book can't simultaneously meet the criteria for political ethics and literary aesthetics. But it is equally reductionist to maintain that the two are synonomous. Ultimately, most artistic endeavors demand a response of split loyalties.

"Ms. Bambara grabs you by the throat... she dazzles, she charms," the fly-leaf quotes the Chicago Daily News. I envy that reviewer. I like to be grabbed, dazzled, and charmed by the books I read and willingly co-operate with the author in achieving that end. But despite the intensity of the situations and settings utilized, the total effect is not moving.

The characters in these stories are too flat and predictable. Naomi, for example, in "The Apprentice," who "assumes everybody wakes up each morning plotting out exactly what to do to hasten the revolution," (p 27) is not nearly so much a person herself as she is a type. As commendable as such dedication may be, the single-dimensional "political animal" is not very interesting or inspiring except to another so inclined.

Which isn't to say The Sea Birds Are Still Alive is devoid of any evocative passages. Bambara demonstrates some insight and ability in "A Tender Man": "He'd been so proud when as a baby she had learned to say 'Daddy' first. That had knocked him out. His sister had offered some psycholinguisticsomethinor other explanation, completely unsolicited and halfway unheard, about a baby's physical capacity to produce d sounds long before m sounds. Cliff paid (his sister) Alma no mind. But as the baby grew more independent, more exploratory of the world beyond her skin, he realized why she could say 'Daddy' so much sooner. Cause Mommy was not separate, Mommy was part of the baby's world, attached to her own ego... It was some time before Mommy was seen as other. And still later that Rhea could step back from herself and manage 'Rhea', then 'me.' " (p 149)

There is sufficient evidence that Bambara is not just an artistic hack or an opportunist trying to ride that last wave from the sixties. But she has produced a work of fiction that reads like The Black Woman, an anthology of political essays editted by her some years ago. Unfortunately a too rigid definition of anti-elitist political commitment has stifled the development and expression of her literary skill.

Surviving American Cuisine

By Alice E. Horner

Picture two tables, one is piled high with packages of cookies and twinkies, nilla waffers and candy bars, French fries and pizza; while on the other stands a single bowl: filled with just picked strawberries, still warm from the sun and drenched in cool, fresh cream. If your immediate reaction is to eat those strawberries, then The Taste of America is your kind of book; if instead you start tearing away cellophane to sink your teeth into a barely concealed lump of sugar, then The Taste of America is your salvation.

This book, which combines the journalistic and culinary talents of John and Karen Hess, is a scholarly masterpiece in highly readable form. It develops and supports the contention that good food in America is a thing of the past, and that by allowing multinational corporations to control our eating patterns, we have not only signed our nutritional death certificates, we have also sentenced ourselves to bland, flavorless food in the interim. Tracing "the rape of the palette" from its beginnings in the mid-1800's (taking wheat germ out of flour, for example, because it clogged up the new machinery) to its absurd, paranoic fruition in the "better than fresh" cries of sterile-minded nutritionists, the Hesses document the decline of flavor in American food. It starts by making a strong case for the varied food habits of early Americans; citing, for example, Thomas Jefferson's Washington diary which listed fourteen types of fresh fruit and vegetables available in the winter month of January, thus disposing of the popular misconception that canned and frozen foods were miraculous inventions which offered us unheard of variety (green mush...yellow mush...). They call to mind succulent meats, slowly roasted in an open fireplace and pungent homemade ciders and beers. The Hesses are eloquent and rational in their attack:

"In the bad old days, a poor workman could lunch on a chunk of good bread, smelling of the earth and golden grain, with a sweet onion, or cheese, or a chewy slice of sausage or lean country ham, and a draft of real beer or cider or homemade wine. Talk of variety — how many hundreds of delicious varieties there were! Talk of convenience — what could be more simple than to prepare such a meal? And yet that workman was eating better than a Wall Street broker can today at Delmonico's, with its stock thicker in the bar clattering the prices of the conglomerates that feed us now."

New England is given a good deal of attention in the first half of the book, which is devoted to the antecedents and sources of American cookery. You probably wouldn't recognize the 18th century recipe for Baked Beans (sans molasses and sugar), and you might find yourself nostalgically wondering about pier-fresh seafood chowders and Indian Pudding made from stone-ground corn meal. These recipes, and more, are provided for the interested — of course, finding the ingredients which even approximate the quality of those that fed our regional forefathers is a difficult task, indeed. And it isn't only New England which has given up its distinct flavor for the great bland, blend so well represented by the fast-food mile of our own Rt. 9; all of America has, so much so that the Hesses have declared a national disaster:

"There was a time in the memory of Americans still living that travel in our country could be a gastronomic adventure...Menus changed with the seasons and regions: jambalaya in Louisiana, Brunswick stew in Georgia, scrapple and crab cakes and shad in the Mid-Atlantic states, wild mountain trout in the Rockies, lobster stew and chowders and baked beans with ham and brown bread in New England."

The Hesses do not exaggerate, on my cross-country jaunt last summer. I was appalled at the uniform monotony of American food: everything looks and tastes the same, only the road signs change. I suppose that it's a monument to General Foods and such that prepackaged goods not only bring new kinds of "food" to where they never before existed, but have also virtually eliminated them in their original forms in their original homelands. Bon appetit.

In the second half of the book, the demi-gods of American cuisine are put into their place, which one begins to suspect is not the kitchen. The Hesses took particular pains to reveal the clay feet of Fannie Farmer who, among her many faults, is responsible for the terrifying belief that it is better to cook by careful measuring than by careful tasting. After deflating Fannie's souffle, they went on to poke holes in the likes of Julia Child, Irma Rombauer and James Beard. But their real attack was leveled at "lifted-pinky cuisine", alias the gormet plague. Now the Hesses lived and dined in France for many years and have a hearty appreciation for the "vrai cuisine de France" which can be summed up as respect for the flavor, beauty and idiosyncracies of food. Their contempt is aimed at Craig Claiborne and other petty dictators who misconstrue heavy sauces, costly ingredients and flashy combinations as gormet cooking (John Hess was Craig. Claiborne's predecessor as New York Times ' food critic, but he "threw in his napkin" after nine months, aghast at the condition of eating in the United States). The true absurdity of the situation becomes obvious when one walks down the aisles of any supermarket and sees dehydrated potatoes "au gratin", complete with factory cheese; or some frozen mess of chicken labelled "coq au vin." The real tragedy for me was to discover that even highly reputed expensive restaurants take short-cuts, use substitutes, and put more energy into menu writing than cooking. Thus: "The dirty secret of American luxury dining is precooked frozen food. It will remain a secret, because the industry has no intention of allowing the public to know that it is getting vending machine food at luxury prices." Granted, we can all probably think of exceptions to this dismal rule, but it must have been awfully nice, back in 1825 or so, to eat like people instead of test tubes...

The theme is always taste, and it persists throughout the book as the authors take on recipe writers, food critics, nutritionists and other professionals feeding off the food industry. The decline in taste is thus directly correlated to the rise of the food corporations and their parasites, the Hesses conclude that a return to small-scale, regional food production would be a sound move all-around; their coup de grace being a brilliant critique of our contemporary petroleum based farming technology. "Our commercial food system is subverting itself. Inflation, and especially the rise in the cost of fuel, has destroyed what economic logic the system appeared to have. Its pollution of the environment and of the food supply has caused our more intelligent citizens to question the established wisdom..."

Ultimately, it comes down to developing an awareness of our food, and therein must lie the solution of all the food related problems plaguing our society: blandness, high cost, malnutrition, obesity...The Taste of America offers a taste of what it used to be like and how it should be, it is a declaration that the taste of food should be an honest pleasure: amen.

Returning for a moment to that bowl of strawberries, picture them drenched in Grand Marnier instead of cream. Should you find that more appealing, James Beard's newest effort, James Beard's Theory and Practice of Good Cooking, may find a happy home on your book shelf. It's one of those huge, fat cookbooks that tells you how to do everything from slicing celery to unlumping your bechamel sauce, and is written in a chatty style which somehow manages to impart a great deal of information. Granted, Beard has a mild case of the gourmet plague, but then again, so do I. In fact, the similarities between this book and The Taste of America far outweigh the differences: both deal with problems of quality and technique — the underlying foundations of good taste. James Beard may eat marshmallows (a complaint of the Hesses) but he eats a great many other things as well, over three hundred recipes are thus offered in this his eighteenth endeavor.

James Beard at 73 is the granddaddy of American cuisine and this book is, in many ways, an autobiography through food. ("I learned to cook with my hands at a very early age, long before I ever held a spoon or beater. I can remember making a cake — a quick, simple coffeecake — by first opening my hand like a big fork to mix and beat the batter and then cupping it like a spoon to scoop the batter from the bowl.")

Interestingly, Beard received his training in the dramatic arts and not in cooking, yet he has been professionally involved with food for forty years. It may be due to this lack of formal training that Beard's recipes have that unique flair which comes from experimentation, for example, food combinations of onions and oranges, or zucchini and walnuts. His recipes are arranged according to cooking techniques, for example, "Boiling" or "Sauteing", the idea being that one perfects them as techniques which employ the same basic concept. Personally, I find this arrangement annoying, but at least Beard offers a complete index for those of us who want to look up specific foods. Besides the recipes, one finds extensive descriptions of cooking terms, basic kitchen tools, and visual treatments of carving. Beard's fifty-seven page concordance of ingredients is especially impressive for its basic information as well as its practical insights. Thus, the beginning cook would do well with a copy of Beard, although there is certainly plenty to entice a more seasoned cook.

The Theory and Practice of Good Cooking is not a master plan for producing hundreds of thousands of little James Beards in ten easy lessons, but a workbook for those interested in learning and perfecting the fundamentals of good cooking. As such, it is a book to be digested slowly and ingested into one's own system of cooking, most of all, it is a book to be enjoyed.

SUPER-FOLKS
BY ROBERT MAYER

Pop culture freaks take note! Dial Press has just thrown you a rather large bone in the form of Superfolks, a novel by Robert Mayer.

If you ever loved comic books or caught yourself watching more than one episode of Mary Tyler Moore then this book is for you.

David Brinkley, a quiet and unassuming copy-editor for a New York newspaper is in reality a retired super-hero, blasted to earth as a baby from the doomed planet Cronk. No ordinary superhero, Brinkley has been retired for eight years because of his weakening superpowers. Then...a menace! And Brinkley must take to the air again "at ten pounds over his best flying weight."

Of course Brinkley has his weaknesses. Huge chunks of his home planet have fallen to earth and whenever Brinkley comes in contact with this "Cronkite" he becomes powerless. Also, our hero is somewhat of a klutz. Whenever he uses his supervision for voyeuristic purposes he is immediately punished by tripping or running into something. During his horny high school years, this earned him the title of clumsiest boy in the class.

The cast of the novel is borrowed from real life, from comic books and from television. The minor characters throughout run like a Who's Who of pop culture, past and present. Charlie Chaplain, Kojak, Womder Woman, Snoopy, Mary Tyler Moore, Bella Abzug and even Peter Pan are all here, delightfully intertwined into the story.

Robert Mayer, the author, was a reporter and columnist for Newsday, a New York paper, and his novel shows the immediacy of good journalism. Mayer has caught our times as reflected in all our popular culture and Superfolks is an entertaining read for it. The only problem with such immediacy is that five years from now, this book will probably be very dated. So get it while it's hot. Superfolks is a definite "no-brainer" escape vehicle with only one drawback — the $3.95 price.

Hard Way Up

EVEREST: THE HARD WAY
By Chris Bonnington
Random House
300 pgs. $12.95

By Chris Bourne

It towers over 29,000 feet in the air. Sheathed in ice and snow and rocked by winds that can reach more than 100 mph, it has presented a challenge to men since it was first determined to be the highest mountain in the world back in 1852.

Everest was first climbed in 1953 by Tenzing Norkay and Sir Edmund Hillary. Since then there have been many other expeditions to its steep slopes. There are so many, in fact, that you have to make reservations as the Nepalese government will only allow one expedition on the mountain at a time. According to the book, the mountain is presently booked until 1979, so you will have to wait a while if you want to run out and climb Everest.

In the meantime, you can pass the time by reading this book. Bonington is an expert climber who has led several expeditions to the Himalayas as well as Everest.

The book is the story of his 1975 expedition, which became the first to climb Everest by the southwest face, one of the most difficult routes.

Bonington has succeeded in writing a book that is of interest to both climbers and non-climbers. He seldom ventures into technical jargon that no one can understand. The story is kept moving very well and is well written.

Bonington keeps his feelings and emotions out of the book for the most part. He prefers to leave this to the other members of the expedition, by working sections of their diaries into the book, a task which Bonington does very well.

In fact, the first team to reach the summit wrote the entire chapter on that part of the climb.

The book also includes a very complete and surprisingly interesting appendix. The members of the team who were in charge of a particular area such as food or climbing equipment, write about what they had to consider and what they needed for the climb.

The two color photo sections in the book are simply incredible. There were several professional photographers and a BBC-TV film crew on the expedition. They succeeded in getting some of the best photographs that I have ever seen. They capture what it is like to be 20,000 feet up in the air, on a vertical wall, and trusting your life to a thin piece of rope far better than any words.

The only problem with this book, that I can see, is the price. $12.95 is a bit steep if your not an avid mountain climber or avid armchair adventurer, so you might want to consider the library. Otherwise, this book is available in the University Store.

Phases and Stages

PASSAGES
By Gail Sheehy
Dutton
$10.95 hardback

By Charles Sackrey

People are born, they die, and in between they go through various phases and stages. Such is the stuff of this book, particularly the journey from young adulthood to midlife and beyond. Sheehy calls her study "passages," rather than "crises," in order to suggest that the movement from one stage to the next is — potentially — a step into greater maturity and fulfillment. It all depends.

The book has been a very big success (currently finishing its 41st week on the best seller list and soon to be published as a Bantam paperback), and for good reasons. On one level, it is impossible not to find yourself in the midst of one or more of the passages described. Are you a 20 year old, having problems adjusting to the new independence from your parents? A thirty year old male, hating your spouse, trapped by a lousy job, surrounded by snot-nosed kids? Or, perhaps, a 37 year old woman, whose last kid has gone to school, married to a man who wants you to stay at home and screw less (when you want to work and screw more)?

Well, if you're there, or in one of dozens more such passages-crises, you'll find yourself in the pages of this book, often squirming to avoid the obvious similarity between yourself and some especially undelightful character in the book. It's not, however, the simple fact that so many of us can squeeze ourselves into the roles she describes. Additionally, Sheehy is an uncommonly spirited prose stylist, who writes with a sense of mission energized by her own passage toward midlife (described in an incredibly powerful beginning chapter.) Moreover, though doing sociology, she has successfully avoided the dreariness of a "summary of the literature," and has, in many parts of the book, done much original work. Finally, in listing the book's strengths, it is without doubt one which will change you as you read it. That seems to me an inescapable result.

But, there's danger here. Sheehy has in essence deduced her "passages" from a tiny sample of this world's teeming hosts: her conclusions are based on in-depth interviews with only 115 (!) individuals (sometimes interviewed as couples.) Furthermore, she has concentrated her efforts on "educated middle class" Americans, first because of the relatively few obstacles to their choosing their lives, and second, because they are "cultural pacesetters," the "Major exporters to other classes of new life patterns and attitudes." Interestingly, and giving a good hint about a basic perspective of the book, Sheehy suggests there is roughly a five year lag between the emerging middle class values of her pacesetters and the adoption of those values by working-class young people.

This sort of sloppy generalizing is, of course, arrogant, particularly since Sheehy herself is such a "pacesetter." But, her arrogance is not the main problem of her method. The major problem of the class bound prison in which the book is presented is that — like all such studies — when reading it, we tend to explain our problems precisely in terms of the explanations given us in its pages. For example: as a 22 year old, female, college senior, you might be feeling desperate about what you're going to do next year, or for the rest of your life. And, if you were to read this book, you would find that you are, very typically, being torn by two often conflicting demands: 1) the need to be secure, maybe to nest with a lover or spouse, and 2) the need to avoid locking yourself into long term commitments. After such a reading, you might conclude that your problem has been explained, allowing yourself to sit back and wait for the passage to end. It could be a long wait, indeed.

Being 22 years old in the U.S. today is, certainly, often a desperate state to be in; but, who knows exactly why? One aspect of the drama virtually ignored by Sheehy is that facing all college graduates (to continue the example of this particular "passage") is a job market whose fundamental rules are dictated by an awesome phalanx of monopoly firms. Perhaps your choice upon graduation will be either selling carcigonenic cosmetics, or helping big banks make big money off little people. Or, alternatively, you might prefer to marry a rising young executive and produce children for the two of you. Here also, however, you can be driven mad, simply because, as a college senior, you will have surely been introduced to a myriad of reasons why latching onto an ambitious male is (at most) often a ghastly half life. No exit, indeed.

The point is this: lots of things make our passages from one part of the life cycle to the next one very trying times. And, certainly, as Sheehy argues, there might be patterns and similarities in the ways people grow toward middle life in the U. S. We might even grant her the argument that the aging process, to some extent, is determined by universal physiological processes generating pressures in the lives of people in every culture. But, at last, her answers are too easy, too generalized, based on too small a sample, trying to make the educated American middle class the focal point out there in fringe-land to which all of us aim our weary bodies and lagging lifestyles. Middle class people, like all of us, are presently caught up in a struggle against the rest of struggle against the rest of the world to maintain a living style which depends largely upon poorer nations giving us their resources rather than using them for themselves.

The truth is that the entire U. S. population is involved in a passage, whether it knows so or not: the passage from the "Big Hogout" to something based on less energy, less consumption, and the heavens alone know what else. So, if some of us are feeling desperate as we go from 20 to 30, or from there to 40 and beyond, who knows, finally, what causes our discontents?

I suspect Sheehy's middle class dynamos have some of the answers; I suspect, also, that they — and she as their interpretor — are just as confused as the rest of us about what's really happening to us and to our wildass culture. In sum, it's all more complicated than Ms. Sheehy lets on, and that's the best and most interesting thing about us folks, pushing our Florsheims from one stage to the next one.

> Being 22 years old in the U. S. today is, certainly, often a desperate state to be in.

Notes From Middle-Earth

By E. Patrick McQuaid

C. Godin graphic

Middle-earth is now well rooted in our vocabulary. It began in the vivid imagination of its inhabitants who named its seas, mountains, forests, and skys and explained their reasons for being. It passed down several thousands of years under several names finally emerging as "Middle-earth" in the poetic mind of John Ronald Reuel Tolkien. It is peopled by the common and the uncommon, the divine and the demi-divine, the good and the evil. It is in fact very much like the world that we know.

The name of Middle-earth has found its way into several volumes of scholarly work and poetic fantasy with the death of its historian in 1973. It has become the subject of illustration even with the imaginative limitations set upon it by Tolkien's extensive detail and we may be assured of a Tolkien calendar from now till Ragnarok.

In the Tolkien tradition are a number of new titles lining the fiction and criticism shelves of bookshops today. Among them are Ruth S. Noel's The Mythology of Middle Earth which I mention first because unlike most of the rest it is a scholarly contribution to the study of folklore and myth. Aside from her clean and entertaining prose style, Noel has an outstanding quality, rare among her colleagues, for brevity. The chapters as well as the book on the whole are brief, clear, and concise. The amount of detailed attention that the author has managed in to less than 200 pages in amazing yet The Mythology of Middle-Earth is not a massive undertaking on the reader's part. Noel has done her homework and it is expected that the reader has done likewise; thus it is by no means an introduction to Middle-earth. What is expected of the reader is a knowledge of Tolkien and a familiarity with the grounds over which Noel is treading.

A background in Old English, Old Norse, and Old Irish isn't necessary for the average reader to enjoy Tolkien nor is it necessary to appreciate the work that Noel has undertaken. Written for a fairly intelligent reading-audience, all historical and literal references are explained without extensive plot summary to any of the Tolkien tales.

The book is divided up into Themes, Places, Beings, and Things and subdivided into chapters on such topics as Language, Hobbits, Dragons, and Rings of Power. Very valuable to the study of Tolkien's intricate folkstructures is Noel's glossary of Middle-earthen terminology concluding the text. Partially drawn from Tolkien's own notes in A Tolkien Compass, the glossary gives an actual source for a number of names and terms scattered throughout Tolkien's volumes. The character's name "Frodo", for instance, derives from the Old English frod, meaning "wise, prudent, sage" as well as from freoda —"protector, defender"— and freodo —"peace, security." The name Froda appears in Beowulf. Thus the ring-bearing hobbit's name is not arrived at by mere chance.

The Mythology of Middle-Earth is not so much of a reference book as it is an afterstudy. Assuming that the reader is not skimming this work as an introduction to Tolkien it is highly enjoyable and recommended reading.

"An erotic Tolkien" claims the back-cover of Seamus Cullen's Astra and Flondrix, and indeed there is no question as to just exactly what those twin towers are. Our story begins well after the atomic age has witnessed its own logical conclusion. Unlike the ancient Norse deities we can actually look forward to our own atomic Ragnarok; the "myth" of the bomb hangs over us heightened by the threat of its certainty. Well after it's been dropped the pieces have been somewhat put back together again mended with a sense of humor by Seamus Cullen.

Like Tolkien, Cullen has taken the liberty to assign his Elves certain characteristics whether or not they conform with the descriptions handed down through oral tradition. Most notable among his elves is the lack of sexual organs as we know them —"'Why didn't you tell me she didn't have a—a—you know what?'" Barlocks, the Dark King stammers after attempting to seduce the Elvan princess Glortina. His wizard, Gonzola, fills him in on the facts of Elvan life after the king has forced oral tradition on the unconscious Elvan princess and the next morning she has left him with a son—" 'Nor does she have a naval,' the magician reminded him. 'Neither does the infant. Would you care to tell me what you did after you made your discoveries concerning Elvan anatomy last night? No need, I know. For that is how it works for Elves. But only when an Elvan woman wills it or is drugged. Furthermore, it takes them nine hours, not nine months.'" (pgs. 28-29).

The child, Igorin, is sent away to live with the shepherdess Ungar who lives alone, and accordingly, with her goats at the edge of the enchanted forest. One day while tending the sheep, the innocent Igorin comes to Elvanhood when he is seduced by Astra and the Tolkien odyssey begins. Igorin becomes Flondrix and sets out in search of an identity and in the Tolkien tradition the book climaxes in world eruption but concludes in a saucy, almost sentimental scene that is characteristic of much of the book. Several of the characters and situations are reminiscent of Peer Gynt rather than any particular work of Tolkien.

The humor of Astra and Flondrix is ribald in the style of something in the like of Playboy. It is entertaining and amusing; a solid background in Tolkien and Dr. Strangelove can only add to the reader's enjoyment especially concerning the apocalyptic fourth world war — "'Gonzola, Tritertium 333 will be the most devastating force in the Cosmos. If unleashed, it could destroy the Cosmos as we know it.'" (p. 148).

Greyfax Grimwald, the first volume in a series entitled Circle of Light by Niel Hancock is a thoroughly enjoyable piece and totally unbelievable. The Circle of Light is the equivalent of the Fellowship of the Ring crowded with Elves, Dwarves, wizards, Worlds Before Time, dragon stones; all the ingredients necessary for a Middle-earth here know as Atlanton Earth.

The book begins much like a take-off of Thus Spake Zarathustra in which a smarter-than- the-av-er-age bear descends down from the heavens from his home, a thousand year journey into the mortal world. He begins a seemingly aimless quest and is joined by a Dwarf named Broco. (perhaps from the Old English "brego" meaning "leader, ruler, prince, king). Broco is a loremaster, a keeper of the secrets of old, and takes on a leadership role as the story progresses. A Disneyesque otter follows along, playful and absentminded.

They encounter perils both natural and unnatural. A mysterious dark-cloaked stranger, a stock character in sagas of this sort gives them trouble. The point of their journey becomes clear to the reader as well as the three travelers after meeting up with the magician Greyfax Grimwald. They are enlisted in his combat against the powers of evil and the forces of the Dark Queen.

This is by all means "escapist" literature; I found it absolutely enchanting, a term I rarely employ. If you enjoy The Lord of the Rings purely for its entertaining values, and each year take in the Wizard of Oz re-run then you'll be wanting to take some time aside and map out your reading for the next year. If the three companion volumes are as delightful as the first (to be published in June, August, and October) then fantasy fans have much to look forward to.

On a much more realistic note are Hermann Palsson and Paul Edwards' most recent contribution to the Penguin Classics series of Icelandic sagas, Egil's Saga and Cecelia Holland's novel Two Ravens (to be released April 26 by Alfred A. Knopf).

Egil's Saga in one of the five major sagas of native Iceland and parallel to the great epics of the Greco-Roman world. Like the landscape from which they have come, the sagas are harsh and sometimes biting chronicles of the lives of Icelandic settlers and farmers, merchants and sailors, poets and pirates. All the elements of Norse literature and legend are to be found in the character of the book's hero Egil Skallagrimsson. He is a living contradiction within himself, the Apollo-Dionysus of the Homeric tradition, the Odin of the Norse, at one time a creative artist and a ruthless killer, a tiller of the soil and a nomad of the earth, a legal advisor and a devil's advocate, a drunkard and a miser.

An extraordinary amount of the saga is composed of the hero's poetry, most of which is self-apraising. Chapter 78 is entitled "Egil's Poetry" and outlines the circumstances behind several verses such as one on the death of his son Gunnar, lost to the sea called "Lament For My Sons". At one point, in the company of his enemies, Egil composes a poem in their honour and saves his own life.

Egil Skallagrimsson is by no means a good man, but he does not leave us with a negative impression though to outline his life would be to pile atrocity upon atrocity. He is, in the end, a poet, and although self-destructive he survives both in his verse and in the memories of the Icelanders. His ancient bones, unearthed after several years of burial will not break at the power of Christianity and Egil Skallagrimsson remains a monument to the pagan world.

In Two Ravens, Cecelia Holland has successfully recreated the tone and style of these Icelandic sagas. The narration is one that calls upon the reader to observe. It is constructed in such a way that the reader may look in upon the action as it carries itself from one scene to the next, the style of the ancient sagas as well as some of the greatest literature of the Twentieth Century such as much of Hemingway's writing.

The plot is also very Icelandic; the coming of Christianity has set hearts astir and divided families. The hero, Bjarni, escapes his home and the rule of his father and makes for Norway to go plundering. Unlike most of the sagas, he is unsuccessful and left to wander alone through England, a land that is not mentioned too frequently in the sagas. He cures the king of a somewhat imaginary illness and gaining his favor lives there comfortably. After a time he returns to Iceland and takes a hold of the power well aware that he has condemned himself to a life of misery.

Holland has not limited herself by adopting this style of narration, she has, rather, successfully brought back to life the tension and chaos, the violent poetry that is Icelandic saga.

Certainly Terry Brooks is a gifted writer, but perhaps it is because he has taken the pains to understand his own characters that makes The Sword of Shannara such a believable fantasy that far outshines the competition in Tolkien titles. He is well aware that by this time we know about Trolls and Dwarves and such and does not waste time describing them, but treats them as part of the ordinary makeup of his fantasy epic. We are immediately immersed in the story as Flick Ohmsford is wending his way home one dark night and is suddenly confronted with a tall, dark cloaked stranger...-though not the same one that we met in the Circle of Light.

Brooks does not attempt to hide the fact that Tolkien was the first to exploit the ancient Arthurian romances or the Wagnerian (another borrower) tales of Sigfreid. All the traditional roles are filled; the evil Warlock , the fool, the wizard, the witch, the virgin, the hero, the shady stranger, and of course the sacred talisman. He begins his tale with countless parallels to Tolkien then gradually slips into his own style which is as equally refreshing.

You've heard the story before, the one where the guy minding his own business is singled out as the only saviour of what is good and must abandon his simple, rustic life for one of adventure and intrigue battling shadowy demons and creatures of the night. Of course there is a quest. In this case it is the ancient Sword of Shannara which must be unearthed by the only living descendant of Jerle Shannara and used to strike down the forces of evil and the Powers of Darkness before they...well, I wouldn't want to ruin the plot for you.

The story itself will surely chipped its way into the best sellers list without the aid of the publisher's elaborate packaging. Released simultaneously in hardcover and paperback, the volume is handsomely set in a clean, crisp typeface and embellished with lavish illustrations by Greg and Tim Hildebrandt who designed the 1976 and '77 Tolkien calendars.

Brooks promises a sequal about the Highlander Menion Leah, one of the heroic characters of the book. He has established himself now with The Sword of Shannara and paid his debt to Tolkien. We can only hope now that Brooks is the birth of a new tradition in fantasy cult literature.

Well, your summer reading is set aside and it's up to you to keep the characters and plots separate from one another. If you'd appreciate a super-natural reference book at your fingertips you're in luck.

Katherine Briggs' An Encyclopedia of Fairies is much more than what its title implies. The serious student of folklore as well as the casual reader will find it both scholarly and entertaining. No study could possibly include everything, but Briggs' well documented and detailed work covers quite a bit of material from Irish, English, and Scandanavian folktales, a good number of American relatives, to notes on collectors and folklorists.

After each entry, the tale type or motif index code is listed for further reference and enjoyment. If not soley for its academic merits, An Encyclopedia of Fairies provides hours of pleasurable reading and browsing.

TRUCK

John Jerome

By Booker T. Fan

Truck is not a "how to," but a "can do" book, and for that belief alone, this hardcover journey into a winter with John Jerome is of value. In a world, or country, overwhelmed with mechanically incompetent people, Truck comes along down the highway of defeated attitudes and allows the reader to not only imagine, but believe, that you yourself are capable of driving and understanding the machine, even while we are all junkies to the techno-kings.

Mr. Jerome recounts his experiences as he breaks down and rebuilds a 1950 Dodge pick-up, a simple machine, but one which requires great effort to operate properly.

He purchased the vehicle to save effort hauling manure for his organic garden. The thoughts and beliefs of organic gardening and country life leak from his writing, like the oil leaked from his rebuilt machine; and Jerome has subject for another book with his experiences in northern New Hampshire. This is good reading for all who have lived in the country, for we can experience empathy with his trials and tribulations; and a fine reader for those hippie organic types who always claim they are ready for the move and never do. If you ever worked alongside a cruisin wood stove, planted an organic garden, rebuilt any machine or lived in the country, while using your wits, you'll quickly recognize the story of Jerome and his truck, Harry S. Truman.

When you cannot find your fuel pump, or have no understanding of the operation of an auto engine, or that funny looking whatsyacallit under the air filter, Truck is a good starter.

Even if you never work on a machine, you'll be able to perform basic trouble shooting if you stall or heard some bazaar clanking or clinging. In the Giant parking lot of life surrounder by many little Amherst Towings', you need to understand your machine to protect it, and your pocket-book.

Truck is for the beginner, it contains hand drawn diagrams illustrating why the frame is where it is, what is it, why the engine is placed as such, and hundreds of facts usually foreign to the average driver; if anything it stresses the importance of proper maintenance. As one of the many bogus t.v. commercials reads — 'Pay me now, or pay me later,": with Truck you might realize that you really do not have to pay him at all — that you yourself can save that high labor charges.

It is truly absurd to pay someone ten or twenty dollars to change an oil or air filter, but many folks do. Reading Truck can save you dollars, and give you some autoconfidence.

The experienced mechanic will not increase his knowledge of auto repair, but should recall his first few jobs, and laugh along with the author as he learns the tricks of the trade. Jerome quickly realized that the power of hand lotion for the job, and with reading you can too.

Truck is more than a story of one mans' experience taking on the monster and many side ghouls of Detroit, it is a story of our times, and it offers solutions to the pollution of our daily lives. In a world dependent on mechanical travel, this humorous informative book could save folks lots of bucks, and build that necessary confidence when you get behind the wheel and turn the key, sending the electrical message to the starter cellunoid, which kicks the starter, turning the flywheels, lifting the cylinder and — by gosh, it's magic, the damn thing starts.

Happy driving and reading.

The author lives in the country, eats from his organic garden and has rebuilt, partially a 1950 F 100 Ford pick up.

Exotic Is The Norm

A BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER
By Joan Didion
Simon & Schuster
$8.95

By David Milofsky

Readers of Play It As It Lays will recognize the emotional landscape of Joan Didion's new novel. Exotica is the norm, from California to the mythical Central American "republic" of Boca Grande, where the ruling family amuses itself with booze, dope, revolution and palace intrigue. It is a novel of loss, ultimately of wasted life. And despite its occasional excesses, it has great power and originality.

A Book of Common Prayer is the story of Charlotte Douglas narrated by her friend Grace Strasser-Mendoza, an American left holding "59.8" of the wealth and power in Boca Grande after her husband's death. Like Charlotte, Grace is an outsider, an anthropologist, but she is not in danger. Charlotte has come to Boca Grande to escape her life in America; to escape the F.B.I., who are trying to find her daughter, Marin, an avowed terrorist. Charlotte is also running from her two husbands: Warren, a brilliant mad-man, and Leonard, a lawyer for the big-money radical left. Alone in Boca Grande, Charlotte has reached the end of the string. She nurtures the hope that Marin will come to her and imagines that they are inseparable.

Grace, like Charlotte is a survivor, but not for long. She is dying of cancer and has seen enough to be sceptical that things will improve either for her or for Boca Grande. She is scornful of her son Gerardo, who is engineering the latest putsch, and protective of Charlotte.

Didion is never specific about Charlotte's appeal for Grace, but it lies at least in part in Charlotte's essential innocence. Unlike Gerardo, Marin, or Leonard, Charlotte does not really understand the theatre of politics and thus she takes things to heart. She is destroyed by her daughter's image on the television screen, by her voice on tape over the radio. And she is slowly driven mad. It is this innocence that Grace recognizes and tries to protect. In telling Charlotte's story, Grace is bearing witness, in the religious sense, but in the end she must acknowledge her failure to keep Charlotte alive.

Charlotte, too, is a christian; in her way, she is a missionary. In Boca Grande, she works first in a cholera clinic, then as a birth-control counselor. Unaware, or perhaps uncaring, of the chaotic political situation, she does good works and defies death. Only when her irrelevance is clearly demonstrated by terrorists destroying crates of cholera vaccine for fun, does she break, and even then she will not leave.

Despite the danger to her life, Charlotte will not board the last plane out of the country with Grace. Instead she returns to her hotel and her work, though there is no one left to counsel, and one suspects it is because she has nowhere left to go. Defeated by her aspirations to love, marriage, and motherhood, certain death is not as threatening as her remembered life in America.

A Book Of Common Prayer is Grace's offering to Charlotte's memory, and perhaps to herself, to her own half-forgotten ideals. It is a coruscating, driving novel, violent and mean. There are sections from which one wants to turn away, but somehow it is never casual or capricious, and this is its salvation.

Harrowing in its intensity, A Book of Common Prayer is hypnotic as well. There is no mistaking its seriousness, but, wonder of wonders, it is readable too. A Book of Common Prayer is Didion's nightmare inversion of the American Dream. It presents a vision that is as unsparing as it is memorable.

THE URBAN PREDICAMENT
William Gorham and Nathan Glazer, ed.
The Urban Institute, Washington, D.C.
364 pages

By Laurie Wood

The problems faced by American cities today are embodied in the areas of finance, housing, crime, education, and transportation. The Urban Predicament, published by The Urban Institute; an independent, non-partisan research organization established in 1968 to study the problems faced by American urban communities; examines each problem area, and attempts to give the hows and whys associated with them.

Trying to explain the plight of the cities in 364 pages seems a fruitless task, but the authors of each section are able to delve into the particulars of every problem area, while making the reading straightforward for even the person who is not familiar with government and finance.

George E. Peterson, author of the section on finance, keys on the problem of "urban flight," and the implications it is having upon the cities' tax base, and who is paying for the upkeep of the urban areas as a result.

Statistics cited show that over 70 per cent of the cities with populations over 200,000 were losing their populace between the years 1960 and 1973. Urban areas are faced with a Catch-22; that is, in order for them to keep their taxpayers, they must provide them with attractive public services. But, it takes money to pay for public services, and with fewer taxpayers to provide it, public services cannot be maintained, much less improved.

Housing costs, residential racial segregation, and the housing situation of poor households are examined by Frank de Leeuw, Ann B. Schnare, and Raymond J. Struyk in the section about housing.

It has been found that, "There has been genuine improvement in the quality of housing for all income classes in the postwar period." The authors state that much more progress can be made in improving the quality of housing for the poor, but that, "It is infinitely more difficult to improve neighborhoods than it is to improve shelter."

James O. Wilson and Barbara Boland conclude that street crime can best be combatted by improving deterrence programs, accomplishing higher arrest rates, and increasing the certainty of penalty on conviction. Their chapter on crime in the cities also offers suggestions as to how city residents can protect themselves from being victimized.

The authors blame the government for the amount of crime in the cities. They say that it, "...resists hiring more judges, revising penal codes, reducing the backlog in the courts, making penalties more certain or more severe, or keeping offenders off the streets."

The authors of the chapter about education, James S. Coleman and Sara D. Kelly, deal primarily with an analysis of desegregation that has been occurring in the Southern school system, but, that in the North schools have actually become more segregated. Coleman and Kelly state that "Integration does not, generally, reduce achievement among whites nor according to available studies, does it greatly improve achievements among blacks."

Another of their findings show that, "Perhaps the most significant change that has taken place in recent years within the school and the classroom itself is a relaxation of the school's once well-defined authority over the child..."

According to city dwellers, transportation is the worst problem next to crime and unemployment. Authors Michael A. Kemp and Melvyn D. Cheslow found that the public has a love-hate relationship with the automobile. They state that, "The last ten years have witnessed a remarkable shift in transportation investment policies, largely sparked by the general public's concern about the social costs of automobile use." But, they also discovered that, "...the same public continues to use the automobile profligately."

One book cannot cure the ills of the urban community, but The Urban Predicament has skillfully and as completely as is possible with so limited space outlined the problems being felt by the cities, and has pointed out the direction toward which the government and the public must head in order to correct the predicament the cities are in.

How have the policies of Boston's banks, insurance and real estate companies affected the city and its neighborhoods.

A.L.

Enormously. You're talking about, number one, the banks pressuring Boston by saying: Put your house in order or else we're going to get very tough on loans. That's like telling somebody to crawl. And the banks may be able to make very valid fiscal arguments for what they do. But we're not talking about private enterprise. We're not talking about a bank lending money to a major corporation and saying to the corporation: Look, your profit margin has got to improve or else it's not fair to our stockholders to lend you more money. We're talking about the public sector which is a very fragile, complex, political mechanism. And you cannot run that public sector with all the diverse demands on it from diverse groups with a bunch of banks setting policy.

Number two, if the banks and the insurance companies and the real estate people are so sincere about helping the city let them put an end once and for all to that process by which they theoretically or realistically draw a line around a neighborhood which they say is no longer a good investment. The great irony is that for years and years people have written off whole neighborhoods in this city. And that has a very traumatic effect on the economy of the city and the reputation.

J.M.

Has your perspective been shaped in any way by attending UMass?

A.L.

I think that any perspective I have has been shaped, A) by being a reporter for a long time, covering politics and government. And B), having grown up where I did, which was a low income neighborhood. And C), I'm a liberal, but I didn't learn my liberalism at school. I learned my liberalism at home which was a small apartment. I learned my liberalism in the street. And when people screamed "ginnie" and "kike", my sense told me that was wrong, and that we ought to have a world where people wouldn't scream "ginnie" and "kike".

And that's where I got my perspective. Now UMass didn't hurt that perspective. At UMass I met for the first time Polish Americans. For the first time I met more than two French Canadian Americans in the same room. Really, in that, UMass was a broadening experience. First time in my life that I smelled shit that was used to grow crops. So it was an education for me in many ways. They happened to be some very happy years too.

It's awfully hard to tell what goes into one's perspective. I'll tell you one thing: Thank God I went to UMass and not Harvard.

J.M.

What are the joys and agonies of being a political reporter.

A.L.

Well, I would edit that question to say: What are the joys and agonies of being a reporter. The agonies are that there's a lot of frustration. You go after a story and you work for weeks and it just doesn't fall into place. Unlike the movies about Watergate, unlike the television series about Mr. Andros and his targets. You sit there with a registry of deeds and you read deed transfers. It's agonizing when you work so long and hard that when you come home you can't talk to your kids in a civil manner.

Needless to say, you don't make a much of a living at it. But I expected that so I can swallow it. When I was a reporter, it was agonizing fighting all the time to get into the paper, make sure it got in as it was written as long as it wasn't libelous and it held together, to make sure that the story was complete as possible, to make sure that the people working with me got a fair shake to get into the paper, to make sure there were follow ups done.

The joys are the occasional victory that you win in seeing something bad change and seeing a particular grievance redressed, in blowing the lid off what somebody hoped would be a private deal, in helping people who feel alienated get a shake, in writing a nice story that doen't accomplish anything but tells you about somebody who isn't a bigshot but somebody they just ought to know about. The agonies outweigh the joys, I guess. But it's more fun than being a cost accountant.

J.M.

Thank you, Mister Lupo.

A.L.

Thank you.

Swept Away

EVERYTHING IN ITS PATH
By Kai T. Erikson
Simon and Schuster

By Howard Ziff

Erikson's book begins in curiosity and wonder, the province of novelty, and ends in nobility, an attempt to find in a particular experiences an example of human life everywhere.

The experience was a flood that destroyed lives, property, and the sense of community along Buffalo Creek, a coal-mining hollow in West Virginia. On Feb. 26, 1972 the dam burst sending millions of tons of water and the mining debris on an erratic 17-mile course. Witnesses were literally at a loss for words to describe the disaster — wall of lava or river of mud are common metaphors. What happened may be summed up with another metaphor — the coal and water that had nourished the hollow and its mining camps, consumed it.

Erikson went to West Virginia to evaluate the flood's aftermath on commission from a law firm that was suing the coal company on behalf of flood victims. He is a sociologist and professor at Yale.

His major finding was "the fact...that the amount of human damage done on Buffalo Creek is far more extensive than that reported in other disasters studied by social scientists." The effects on individuals and the community has lasted longer and cut deeper, Erikson argues.

Furthermore, Erikson notes, there was no sense in Buffalo Creek of what other social scientists have detected after other disasters and have called variously "democracy of distress", or a "community of sufferers," or a "post-disaster utopia." Buffalo Creek simply fell apart. No phoenix rose from the mud. The foxholes produced atheists. Why?

Erikson argues that the flood not only destroyed property and lives, it also destroyed the sense of community that the West Virginia mountaineers maintained periously and tentatively despite a greater, long-term disaster, the destruction of the mountain culture by coal mining and logging. The post-disaster utopia and "democracy of distress" felt by other communities struck by disaster has been attributed to a quickening sense that all is not lost, that a larger spirit of community and of value has survived. In Buffalo Creek, Erikson argues, all was swept away, all lost. Help from the outside only confirmed the helplessness.

One thinks of the scene in Macbeth in which Macduff is told that his castle has been surprised, his wife and babes savagely slaughtered. With Shakespeare's characteristic gift for non-poetry, he first depicts Macduff in shock, unable to give sorrow words other than painful, monotonous questionings — "my children, too?" and later, "my wife kill'd too?" After a bit, however, Macduff has recovered enough of himself to launch into a rhetorical frenzy, "O, I could play the woman with mine eyes..." Mere theatricality? Not at all. Macduff's rhetoric quite literally pulls him out of it. He returns himself to the chivalric community his friends remind him of, the community of justice and revenge. And as Macduff rants in an acceptable key, Malcolm is able to find him once again "manly."

In Buffalo Creek virtually no words are found. The bereavement is total, and, it appears, permanent.

Our discussion thus far should not suggest that Erikson's analysis of the destruction of community on Buffalo Creek is simply a model of the exploited and the exploiters, in the person of the coal industry, climaxed by a gigantic, "man-made" flood. Certainly there is a resemblance between the flood and the climactic massacre which often accompanied the long-term "disaster" of colonization — the bloody razing of the capital city or village, the descreation of shrines, the murder of the human symbols of community, chiefs and priests.

It is not to apologize, however, for rapacious exploiters to point out, as Erikson does that another model of understanding exists, a model which doesn't simply view Appalachia as "devastated by circumstances," but which sees in the society a vulnerability to exploitation. Erikson suggests that the notion of "core values" in a society — the idea which helps produce romantic images such as the fiercely independent mountaineer or, to provide ones own example, the idyllic West African villager — be tested against a notion of "axes of variation," which cut from pole to pole through a culture and around which ambivalance, deviation and differences are organized.

In the "mountain ethos" Erikson identifies four axes; tradition-personal liberty, resignation- self- assertion, group- centeredness- self-centeredness, ability-disability, and summarizes them with a fifth, independence-dependence. At one end is the fiercely independent, physically able mountaineer. At the other is the resigned, snaggle-toothed welfare drone.

To employ a metaphor Erikson does not use, and thus perhaps to distort his argument, these axes of variation form a social matrix, a network like a set of bedsprings that support the individual living in the society. At Buffalo Creek the community had been pretty much shoved up into one end of the bed and even before the flood, and the bed collapsed like the dam that hovered over it.

Like any good book, there are many problems with Everything in Its Path. This reader is troubled, for instance, by the ever-present fact that Erikson's role in Buffalo Creek was more than that of a disinterested advocate. It was to the economic advantage of his informants to paint for him and the others involved in the law suit on whose interviews he draws as bleak a picture of their losses and state of mind as possible. We can take on faith that he was nonetheless disinterested and able to detect malingering and barratry.

A more profound problem has already been suggested by inference — the problem of metaphor.

Erikson divides the impact of the Buffalo Creek flood into individual trauma, the state of shock, and collective trauma, the loss of community. But how does one talk about community? It is the ancient problem of the one and the many. We can hardly deny that communities exist, but what are they? Description is not a sufficient answer, any more than the results of a medical checkup tell us what a man is. Inevitably, the writer must employ metaphor.

We have used the metaphor of a bed spring. Erikson uses metaphor of an organism, a magnetic field, a filter, a map, and so forth. Sometimes his metaphor making is self-conscious. Sometimes it goes on without apparent awareness, the natural process of thinking and writing. He concludes with the metaphor of society as a human body, attributing to it the possibility of impotence, sensory overload and apprehension, however diffused.

Yet, none of his metaphors seem adequate to describe the kind of society Buffalo Creek was before the flood. How the mountaineers conceived of it to themselves and how Erikson read that conception is the vaguest, hardest-to-get-your-hands-on part of the book. One suspects this is owing to another axis of variation, articulateness-inarticulateness, which is suggested in the many direct quotations on which Erikson

NEW BURLINGTON
The Life and Death of an American Village
By John Baskin
W.W. Norton & Company Inc.
260 pps $9.95

By E. Patrick McQuaid

Deep beneath the calm waters of the Quabbin Reservoir five New England villages lay dormant. Those who remember are their only monuments save outdated maps that still mark were they once stood.

Further west, in Ohio, the tiny village of New Burlington would have faced a similar fate if not for the patience and concern of John Baskin, a gifted young writer who recorded its final hours and surviving voices.

When Baskin wandered into New Burlington in 1973 he learned that it was only a matter of time before the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers would transform 175-year old cornfields into an aquatic playground. With the construction of a reservoir over the village, vacationers would waterski across the rooftops and steeples of New Burlington, Ohio oblivious to its presence.

Baskin has made the presence of New Burlington known and it can never be forgotten. Like a carpenter, he has skillfully reconstructed the village, its inhabitants, its past and terminal present.

New Burlington is not the first book of its kind. A most successful volume of this nature was published in 1969 called Akenfield. The author, Ronald Blythe, interviewed every member of the small community and eventually printed a portrait of an English village. Baskin has done the same, recording the voices, most of them elderly, to present an oral history of the village in the Twentieth-Century. It is a poem, sung by its hero, and indeed full of sound and fury, its final words: "The town looks mean."

Baskin exerts little control over his narrative. He lets the village speak for itself revealing the inner conflicts of any community large or small. "It is important to see that the villagers constantly contradict each other..." he writes in his Introduction, "...which arises from the unsettling fact that the world itself is both alive and dying."

At the base level Baskin's work is a piece of journalism in that it amounts to a book of group interviews. Yet the level of intimacy that we attain between ourselves and the villagers and observe between the mostly absent narrator and his subjects transforms this unlikely idea into a work of art.

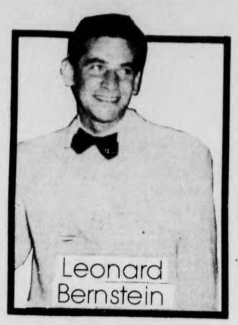
TANGLEWOOD
by Herbert Kupferberg
McGraw-Hill New York
280 pgs. $9.95

By Mark Leccese



Leonard Bernstein

Tanglewood is much more than a series of summer concerts under the stars by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Officially, it is the Berkshire Festival, which incorporates the BSO concerts, a summer music school that has had a magnificent roster of faculty and students, a series of "popular artists" concerts; it is also, of course, a tradition.

The name of the grounds on which this all happens, Tanglewood, which lies on the border between Stockbridge and Lenox in Western Massachusetts, is an interesting story in itself. In 1850 the resident of the house on the grounds was Nathaniel Hawthorne, who, while he lived there, was inspired to write a children's book called Tanglewood Tales. The owners of the property, who were thrilled to have their real estate immortalized in a book by one of America's greatest authors, permanently christened the grounds "Tanglewood."

In the early 1930's, the New York Philharmonic Orchestra began playing summer weekend concerts in the Berkshires, on a horse-track owned by Dan Hanna, the son of Mark Hanna, a famous turn-of-the-century politician.

By 1940, the concerts had been moved permanently to Tanglewood, taken over by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the BSO's music director, the Russian born Serge Koussevitsky, one of the century's finest composers, opened up a school for music students. The faculty boasted of Aaron Copland and Paul Hindemith teaching composition, Gregor Piatigorsky teaching chamber music, and G. Wallace Woodworth, then chairman of Harvard's music department, teaching choral activities.

Koussevitsky himself taught conducting, and after his death, conducting was taught by the subsequent music directors of the BSO, Charles Munch, William Steinberg, Eric Leinsdorf, Seiji Ozawa and others, most notably Leonard Bernstein, who was himself a Tanglewood student. Presently, three of the conductors of the so-called "Big Five" of American symphony orchestras studied conducting at Tanglewood: Lorin Maazel of Cleveland, Seiji Ozawa of Boston, and Zubin Mehta of Los Angeles, who will take over the New York Philharmonic next season. Michael Tilson-Thomas was a student there, as was Sarah Caldwell, who now heads the Boston Opera Company and is considered the country's most innovative operatic conductor.

Students who began their road to stardom at Tanglewood are too numerous to list. Tanglewood was the first musical institution that brought out black talent. Leontyne Price debuted there in the 50's. Every summer, Tanglewood presents a weekend of avant-garde music performed by the BSO, which is a showplace for young composers.

This book is a wealth of information about Tanglewood and the reception of classical

New Fiction On The Shelf

A PLACE TO COME TO
By Robert Penn Warren
Random House
401 pgs.

By Rich Pioli

In A Place to Come to, Robert Penn Warren's tenth novel, one is hard-pressed to find any style of consistency which would induce the reader to believe in these people we meet via life story narrator Jed Tweksbury, big Dante scholar. Much of this novel is very likeable and worth reading unless you're wading through it, in which case there simply are not enough life-giving sparks to secure places for these characters in your literary memory.

There is something wrong. Jed narrates roughly his sixty years of existence, his escape from the poor South, his first marriage to a graduate student, his shooting a Nazi officer during the war, his affair with old childhood pal Rozelle Hardcastle and still we are far away from him, in fact we couldn't care less.

People are reaching for significance beyond realism which lends Warren's characters a strangeness that isolates them from the reader. Those not too strained to appeal include Jed's father and mother and Rozelle who constantly seeks adventure with lovers and friends while friend Jed inevitably ends up appearing boring.

The good moments include Jed's account of his war years fighting with the Partisans and Rozelle's pool party but most of the time everybody is engaged in making their personal lives as complicated as possible. Meaning is forced upon all as though profound significance is the key to happiness. Jed thinks too much, acts falsely, then seeks fulfillment. In the same way A Place to Come to is engaged in seeking that which it cannot have without more naturalness and realistic ease.

THE FAN
By Bob Randall
Random House
243 pgs.

By Rich Pioli

"Oh, Jake,

It's all so loathsome. So degenerate. I don't know if I can hold out until it's all over. But of course you don't know what I'm talking about. I tried to call you but was told you were away for the weekend. I went to the theatre yesterday afternoon for the matinee and when I went into my dressing room, oh God, Jake, it's so awful, someone had defecated and urinated all over the place! Not someone. We know who it was. Him. Jake, the police have been lying to me all the time. His letters haven't been filled with love at all. Belle was only his first victim. Now he's after me."

So goes the show for Sally Ross, famous actress turned fifty as her most devoted fan finally decides there is only one way to get close to his idol (he has already done away with her secretary for intercepting the actress's mail).

In "omniscient mailman" narrative we get to read this tale through the collected letters of anyone who could write although that may be a matter of opinion, friends, ex-husband Jake, secretary Belle, police reports, Sally and her fan. As though Bob Randall could anticipate larger things with this his first novel, it begs for visual representation and is just the good that's being served in the movies nowadays, a little love and death. It's about midway through that one becomes bored and blood and action attempts to fill the vacuum. As for fan Douglas Breen, he is so sloppily defined that he cannot even make par with stereotypical psycho-sicko. If you have to read suspenseful murder stories, try Fowle's similar The Collector where there can be found some well written suspense.

Damned At An Early Age

DOES ANYBODY GIVE A DAMN?
Nat Hentoff
Alfred A. Knopf
245 pp $8.95

By Patti Rosenberg

James Kilpatrick argued not long ago in one of his syndicated columns that the compulsory education laws should be amended to apply to those under fourteen rather than sixteen. Kilpatrick's suggestion was not an admittedly short-sighted albeit immediate measure in response to an urgent situation but a fatal recommendation that if implemented would cause an even worse crisis. Shocking as this article was in its total sidestepping of the problem, it in fact reflected the implicit assumptions on which U.S. public schools have traditionally run.

And continue to run, as is Nat Hentoff's point. By law in this country, education, like voting, is a guaranteed right not a privilege. In practice, however, public schools have neglected and denied their responsibility for educating students insisting instead that it is the students' obligation to allow themselves to be educated. Those who cannot learn what has been rather arbitrarily deemed the appropriate amount and kind of material in the proper manner through standard means are simply given up on as "uneducable." And dealt with accordingly: expelled, passed from grade to grade despite a fundamental inability to read, or mistreated and ignored (like a boy mentioned by Hentoff who spoke only Spanish when he began school and who for two years was kept at a desk in the corner and simply given crayons to keep him busy) until they drop out. Hentoff devotes a chapter to another common institutional reaction to supposedly "uneducable" children. Despite associations of such practices with primitive societies and the Middle Ages, beatings, even those administered with obvious sadism to the point of serious injury, are widespread and officially sanctioned by the courts in all but two states and most of a third. As a resident of the third, I know from personal experience that even where it is illegal corporal punishment exists.

Hentoff offers us examples of teachers that are making their schools work, schools that are making their teachers work, and above all, innovative learning situations that are enabling kids previously labelled failures to work. A tendency to portray both the "uneducable" students and the people who are refusing to accept such evaluations as "noble savages" is corny but not a serious detraction from the value of the information in this book. I can even forgive dialogue that authentically quoted verbatim or not sounds more like something from a young adult novel (a number of which, incidentally, Hentoff has written) than something people really say. A lecture for example delivered by one of the "good-guy" principals to the parents of two boys involved in an inter-racial mugging, is embarrassingly silly in style and content:

"What's going to happen is that your son is going to give up nickles and dimes whenever something like this happens, and then he'll leave this school and go to Bronx Science or some other prestigious high school. From there he'll go on to Harvard or Yale and eventually, let's say to Washington, where he'll be in a position to pass laws or make rules that will oppress this kid because all your son knows about this kid is that once, or more than once, he's shaken him down for some money.'

'Now,' Seabrook went on, gesturing toward the black youngster, 'what do you think is going to happen to this kid? He'll get a dime from your son, a quarter from somebody else, a dollar from another boy, and then he's going to start getting five dollars from the guy at the newsstand at the corner and later, a hundred dollars from the grocery store. So where is he going to end up? At the University of Attica.' " (pp 93-94)

A more significant flaw is Hentoff's simplistic and snide dismissal of the entire "free-school movement." Certainly as Jonathon Kozol (who oddly enough is never mentioned although Hentoff does refer to numerous other noted public school critics and himself makes many of the same observations as Kozol though lacking Kozol's power and vision) has eloquently charged, experimental schools in their emphasis on developing a healthy psyche perhaps reflect "abstract" middle-class needs for emotional happiness more than they reflect the immediate tangible needs of the lower-class for marketable skills. Hentoff's stance seems not so much appropriately skeptical as downright bitter: "To awaken a Lucy to her intelligence may not help quicken the Socialist Coming, unless she turns out to be a latter-day Emma Goldman." (p 91) Elsewhere he contemtuously speaks of "vanguards" and "revolution" in a too heavy-handed parody of white leftists he all but calls "bleeding hearts." It is productive to be aware of class bias where it exists as it indeed does in literature advocating alternative schools. But the whole body of thought is far from just a self-indulgent fad of the "young Bohemian middle-class."

Hentoff's point is well taken that lower-class children do not have but desperately need access to academic knowledge so taken for granted by the middle- and upper-classes that they can denounce it. Higher standardized test scores in black ghettoes would be a huge achievement. But utopian education itself it isn't. The attitude of Luther Seabrook, the principal quoted earlier, is appalling: "I don't think we can afford liberal arts majors either. I had a big fight about that with my oldest daughter. She was majoring in liberal arts at Howard, and it cost me a Volkswagen to get her to change her mind... (p 104) a bigger piece of the pie shouldn't be sneered at but neither should it be misconstrued as the ultimate goal. Pragmatism that hardens into dogma ceases to be pragmatic.

In Small Print

Dover graphic

By E. Patrick McQuaid

There are a number of small but highly acclaimed press and publications in the Amherst area. These few among them have drawn on local talent many of which were part of the English department's MFA program in writing here at the University.

The Lynx House Press is about as small as a small press can get. P.O. Box 800, Amherst. That's about it, and yet in the last few years they've managed to put out a number of very fine sixty-odd paged paperback selections of poetry and fiction ranging from Thomas O'Leary's Fool at the Funeral (poems) to a collection of short stories about Plains Indians by Wayne Ude called Buffalo and other stories.

"Most of the layout is done at my house up at Pleasant Lake," Robert Abel tells us. "Big commercial printers find us a nuisance so we deal with local printers such as the Old Brass Print Shop in Haydenville."

Lynx has been publishing works from authors either from the Amherst area or who were at one time from the region. Many, with the MFA program from 3 to 5 years ago have since made substantial records of small press publication.

Abigail Rorer has illustrated a number of their pieces and most of their covers. She has recently been appearing in a few national art shows. "We're very proud of that," said Abel.

Lynx House Press has put out 8 books this year and on the press right now is The Gambler, a 68 page collection of poetry by UMass Comparative Literature professor David Lenson.

Lenson is now a new-comer to small press publications. He was poetry editor for Panache in 1971, became editor in 1974 and acquired the publication from the estate of the deceased publisher in 1976. Panache itself has been in existence since 1965 and has thus far published 17 volumes of poetry and fiction.

"Something Panache is getting into now," says Lenson, is books. We plan on 2 books, about 60 pages each, per year." Their first book of 1977 is Christopher Howell's The Crime of Luck, a collection of poetry. Howell is the founding editor of the Lynx House Press. The second book scheduled for publication this year is by Fred Will of the UMass Comparative Literature Department. A collection of poetry by Margaret Robison is also planned for future Panache press.

"About 75 per cent of the material we run comes in the mail," he tells us. "We have always paid, always, usually averaging $5 per printed page ... It's hard to figure the circulation of small press because people pass them around a lot. We get submissions from all 50 states and I can name 10 foreign countries. I can't imagine how they got copies of Panache to begin with.

"A lot of us, the small presses, are adrenalized by grants considerably ... The best store for small presses in the area is the Broadside in Northampton but Odyssey in S. Hadley is giving a window display to Lynx House Press very soon."

From a small gray house across from the orchard on East Pleasant St. the University Press has published several volumes of poetry, fiction, political science, and translations since they first began rolling in 1964. Originally located in Munson Hall they are an independent press under the direction of Leone Stein.

The actual printing does not take place at their campus location; however, all scheduling and designing is done there.

Current titles include Robert Francis Collected Poems, 1936-1976, Irving and Margaret Zuby's Changing Rural Landscapes, Jules Chametzky's From the Ghetto, The Fiction of Abraham Cahan and Lee Edwards and Arlyn Diamond's The Authority of Experience, Essays in Feminist Criticism (reviewed in Below the Salt on March 10, 1977).

Soon to be on the shelves is Richard Lebaux's Young Man Thoreau which promises to be quite popular.

The University Press has been awarding the Juniper Award for outstanding poetry since 1975. The award is named in honor of Robert Francis who has named his Amherst residence Fort Juniper. In addition to a cash award of $1,000 a local poet's book is published annually by the Press.

Located in the basement of Memorial Hall, the Massachusetts Review has been printing quarterly for 18 years. One of the most highly recognized literary and public affairs reviews in the country it has a surprisingly low circulation of 2,000 but receives manuscripts for consideration from all parts of the globe.

Most recently a story printed in their Spring 1976 edition, How's Your Vacuum Cleaner Working was chosen as one of the O. Henry Award recipients. Three short stories are also being reprinted by Houghton Mifflin in the Martha Foley Annual Volume of Best Short Stories this year.

The Massachusetts Review is co-edited by Lee Edwards, John Hicks, Mary Heath, and Robert Tucker. They are published with the cooperation and support of the Five Colleges.

Most of the small press publications are available in local bookstores such as Broadside and Logos. If you'd care to subscribe or submit material to any of them you can write to them at these addresses:

relies, There are some moments of simple eloquence. Still more often there are moving moments simply because the events being described are so horrifying and so compelling. But there is also a vast gulf of inarticulateness that suggests no metaphors, no organizing verbal sensibility around the experience of life on Buffalo Creek. Is it too much to suggest that the reason for this is that the physical community was its own metaphor, that the people of Buffalo Creek, unlike "the children of Israel" or "the sons of Erin" images forth their society not in words but in places and physical relationships — this tree, that house, those bushes — that with the literal destruction of the trees, houses, bushes, the images, too were destroyed.

Macbeth's murderers killed Macduff's family, but left him still a member of a rhetorical community. The flood of February 26, 1972 destroyed Buffalo Creek, and with it murdered the vocabulary of stones and trees.

and new music in the 20th century. There are quotes from famous students, an interview with Leonard Bernstein, and a great deal of wonderful photographs.

And the tradition of Tanglewood continues. Over the winter, Gov. Dukakis proposed turning an abandoned school dormitory near Tanglewood into a prison. The program was dropped when he was flooded with complaints from Tanglewood lovers everywhere; the editorial pages of The New York Times had letters nearly every day condemning Dukakis' plan, as many of the Tanglewood regulars are New Yorkers.

This summer's program was published last week, and it includes conducting performances by, in addition to Ozawa, Andre Previn, Pinchas Zucherman, Neville Marriner, Sarah Caldwell, Gunther Schuller, Andrew Davis, Joseph Silverstein (BSO concertmaster, who conducted the BSO here at UMass earlier in the season) and Klaus Tennstedt conducting a weekend of all Beethoven. Tennstedt, a German immigrant, is considered one of the country's most exciting and talented new conductors. In addition, the regular music school activities will continue, producing who knows what new young geniuses.

Like Koussevitsky and Bernstein before him, Ozawa loves the summers at Tanglewood (where, as a student, he won the Koussevitsky Conducting Prize in 1960), and is carrying on its tradition. Recently he said, "Koussevitsky was big poppa to Lenny (Bernstein) and Lenny was big poppa to me."

Tanglewood is an enlightening experience, and, happily, so is Kupferberg's book.

The Clips of Dover

PICTUREBOOKS FROM DOVER PUBLICATIONS
all under $5

By Debbie Schafer

Quite often while roaming through a bookstore you may have wandered into the art book section and reached out for that oversize paperback with the curious title. Here is something that would sit well on your desk-top library. Culture, you may think to yourself. Entertaining — I would like to receive this as a gift. It slips back into place between the others; your finger taps another title.

The Dover collection of fine and applied art books deserve more than to be picked up, admired, and then reshelved on the bookstore display rack. They are unique volumes, finely illustrated archives of the arts, at unbelievably low prices. They are books to keep and to return to often, for reference and for pleasure.

Many Dover books are of particular worth to the graphic designer or newspaper editor. Below the Salt often uses graphics selected from the Dover collection. The [illegible] tractive patterns:

Background, Patterns, Textures and Tints by Clarence P. Hornung ($3.00) contains 92 full page patterns for artists and designers that dazzle the eye, enhancing the appeal of an otherwise mundane graphic.

Occasionally supplementing a Below the Salt headline may be a word or monogram from Fantastic Alphabets by Jean Larcher ($3.00) or Art Noveau [illegible] Alphabets selected by [illegible]. They range in style from being pretty to being very, very bizarre.

Of historical as well as graphic interest are 1800 Woodcuts by Thomas Bewick and His School, Quaint Cuts in the Chapbook Style, and 293 Renaissance Woodcuts for Artists and Illustrators (all under $4.50).) Together they cover virtually every subject imaginable, and the styles vary widely.

A personal favorite of this reviewer is The Picture Sourcebook for Collage and Decoupage edited by Edmund V. Gillon Jr. ($3.95). It contains the widest subject and style of all the books mentioned thus far. The book is printed on one side of the page only, so it can be cut apart to make an original collage—decoupage. Buy one copy The Picture Sourcebook to cut apart, but get a second copy just to save and look through again and again. Frame that collage with a selection from Decorative Frames and Borders selected by Edmund V. Gillon also ($3.50). Gillon has selected examples from the Renaissance to the present.

These are only a few of the many titles published by Dover, and every time I go to a bookstore there seems to be another intriguing title on the shelf. All Dover books are available through the University Store and most are priced under $4.00. There is, I suspect, a little [illegible] in all of us [illegible] books. The Dover books offer us just such a [illegible] at affordable prices, and the information that they contain cannot be found in one handsomely bound package elsewhere.

By Mark Leccese

"Are you fiction or non-fiction?" a well-dressed young woman asks a literary-looking, pipe smoking man at one of William Hamilton's cartoon parties. The same may be asked of William Hamilton.

As a regular cartoonist for The New Yorker, Hamilton's cartoons are all in the same vein: satires of the pretentiousness and values of the American upper class. Educated at Andover and Yale, Hamilton is himself one of the type he so loves to poke fun at. "I see quite a lot of the people I draw," he says. "They're my friends. A good cartoon will often come from seeing something ridiculous — such as a character weakness in myself."

The cartoons in the book are arranged in a chronological order of the characters' lives. The book begins with children and goes through adolescence, college, work, retirement, old age and, finally, death. Hamilton offers the reader two short introductions, one about his characters and another about himself.

Hamilton's cartoons are glib and always on the mark. Cartoon collections are great fun in that they offer a half hour or so of humorous relaxation. Put the book away for a few months, and you can read it again and laugh again. Hamilton offers us cartoons that often have the reader laughing out loud. If you look at it a certain way, society can be awfully funny. And any way you look at it, William Hamilton is awfully funny.

DiCara knocks politicos

By JOE MAGLITTA
Collegian Staff

Boston City Councillor Lawrence S. DiCara yesterday criticized Massachusetts politicians for "running out of habit, rather than commitment."

DiCara blamed politicians with "less than altruistic" motives for downgrading the quality of government and spawning disillusionment among citizens. He said unless a commitment is made to upgrade government, America will be faced with "professional" politicians committed only to personal advancement and security.

"If economic survival is the motivation force of politicians, it is not surprising that the political careerist should attach secondary importance to the merits of the issues. Instead of expertise in municipal finance or public transportation, the politician is more likely to be adept at backscratching and going to wakes," DiCara said.

Speaking to a group in the Campus Center, 27-year-old DiCara said political relationships and alignments have become more important than serving the state. Unless changes are made, he said the state will be faced with politicians who consider a spot on the public payroll a necessity, rather than an option.

DiCara, a six-year veteran of the City Council, is expected to announce his candidacy for State Treasurer at the beginning of next month.

"I can out-work, out-organize, out-think and out-talk any other candidate," he said.

DiCara called management of the resources a "prevailing factor" in the state for the next 25 years. A closer scrutiny, he said, would help to avoid large deficits in the State budget.

"We should be earmarking funds from specific taxes to specific programs. A deficit doesn't just happen overnight. A good watchdog in the treasurer's office could have forewarned us of a $450 million deficit in 1975. We have probably given out millions of dollars without even knowing where it's going to," DiCara said.

He suggested using outside consultants from private corporations and universities to advise the state on municipal management.

Under the agreement, consultants would be contacted without cost to the state, thereby providing "professional" skills. DiCara said the system is used in New York City, but has not yet been introduced to Boston.

"These people are responsible for some of the largest corporations in the world. They understand how the system works. Why can't they take this one step further to the municipal level? I am not an accountant, wouldn't claim to be. Modern accounting methods are called for and they can provide them," he said.

In return for their services, DiCara said the firms would be able to "stick a feather in their cap's". He said corporations and other institutions have an obligation to loan help to the State.

"We don't have to end up like New York City," he said.

Dept. chairperson accepts faculty reallocation plan

This is the last in a series of six articles examining University programs and majors that stand to be affected by the provost's five year plan. (Other related topics will be reported next week.) The provost sent his plan to deans March 24 and has asked them to respond by today.

By JOE QUINLAN
Collegian Staff

A chairperson in the School of Food and Natural Resources yesterday said he "welcomes" the long-range faculty reallocation proposal of Provost Paul L. Puryear.

"Whether they (faculty) like it or not, the action is justified," said Donald R. Progulske, head of the department of Forestry and Wildlife Management.

Progulske said since the reallocation process is a "problematic" decision, he doesn't think a committee could handle it very effectively.

Although his department has not been specifically allocated additional positions, the school of Food and Natural Resources has a projected increase of 10 faculty members.

The school's dean, Ross Whaley, supports Puryear's efforts too.

"For the past three years the faculty and administration have been asking for someone to make decisions," said Whaley.

"He's (Puryear's) taking a strong step in the right direction," continued Whaley. But, he added, "let's see if he survives."

The Division of Nursing chairperson also praised Puryear and his memo. "It's the best report I've seen written at UMass," said Ira Trail.

She said when a report like the provost's plan is presented to an organization which has never had definite goals, there will be "reactions." Trail added the report might be considered by some as "one more item" of freedom being taken away from the faculty.

Other chairpersons in the schools of Natural Resources, Health Sciences, and Physical Education last night offered varied opinions of the report, mainly depending upon its projections for their respective departments.

One chairperson declined to comment until next week, because he said the situation with his department is "touchy."

Food and Natural Resources

Whaley has 14 departments among which he must distribute ten additional faculty positions.

He said he sees four characteristics he will use for deciding which department gets what. Not in any particular order of importance, Whaley said he intends to study the student-faculty ratios, the demand of applying majors, the potential social contributions to Massachusetts, and the need to improve the program's quality as criteria for additional allocations.

Whaley emphasized no one component of his decision guidelines can be used alone for judging allocations.

Whaley said his own recommendations for department allocations will be made "relatively soon."

The departments topping the list for allocations, said Whaley, include Food Science, and Nutrition (FS&N); Hotel, Restaurant, and Travel Administration (HRTA); Forestry and Wildlife Management; Landscaping Architecture and Regional Planning; and Plant and Soil Sciences.

Whaley said student-faculty ratios in his departments range from a low 13:1 to a high 46:1 in FS&N. He noted the one depart-

Reps hear budget woes

By PETER C. PETERSON and JOHN M. MORAN
Collegian Staff

Members of the Massachusetts House Ways and Means Committee yesterday heard the testimony of UMass President Robert C. Wood, Secretary of Educational Affairs, Paul Parks, and Chancellor Leroy Keith from the Board of Higher Education.

The committee questioned the officers in depth concerning the budget for fiscal year (FY) 1978 for the state university system.

A sub-committee of Ways and Means will consider this, and other submitted written testimony in closed session. The entire committee will submit a recommendation to the full house for its approval within the next month.

University of Massachusetts at Amherst, Boston and Worcester, Southeastern Massachusetts University, University of Lowell, the Executive Office of Educational Affairs, and the Board of Higher Education all presenned testimony at the hearing.

Representative John J. Finnegan, chairperson of the House Ways and Means Committee and a UMass alumnus said, "The committee will not be able to make much use of the governor's budget.

"It looks like once again, this year we're going to have to be the ones to make up the budget," he said.

Parks addressed the budgets of both his own Executive Office of Educational Affairs and that of State Public Higher Education in his prepared statement to the committee.

"The education budget, as a whole, is reduced in these recommendations from the FY 1977 level of $250 million to $248.8 million," Parks said.

This reduction in spending would require the loss of 700 to 1300 higher education jobs, according to Parks. Finnegan wanted Parks to speak about the affects of such a staff reduction on the institutions of higher education.

"I'm rather dismayed by your circumvention of the questions, your unpreparedness, and your lack of knowledge of the effects of the proposal which will affect 100,000 students," said Finnegan.

Wood said this is the third year UMass has had to face an executive's recommendation for level budgets and added the universities have had to scramble to survive.

"In many program areas we have 'robbed Peter to pay Paul'. Very specifically our inventories are depleted; we have abandoned regular repair schedules; we have starved our libraries and, finally, we have maintained high levels of position vacancies. Orderly planning has been replaced by a patchwork of emergency measures," he said.

Radical psychiatrist speaks on radical therapy

By ELIZABETH S. KENT
Collegian Staff

"People are looking toward therapy for answers, as 'the solution' to the stress in our society. They have kind of turned it into a religion and that is not good", said Joy Marcus before an audience of 175 persons last night in Mahar Auditorium.

Marcus, a radical psychiatrist, was addressing the problem of "Therapy and Social Change" as a speaker from the Distinguished Visitors Program.

There are three tendencies in the Radical Therapy Movement according to Marcus. There are those who are trying to express concern with the psychiatric institution as an oppressive force in society. These persons are totally "anti-psychiatry".

The second tendency is for people to say they are "radical therapists" but who are not clear in the politics of their relations to the clients and the environment. They do use radical therapy technique.

The third group in radical psychiatry was started about eight years ago at Berkeley to "seek a synthesis between radical technique and radical analysis started in the 60's. Marcus said the Women's Movement played a large part in the Radical Therapy Movement.

"The word psychiatry comes from the Greek words psyche and iatria, meaning soul and healing (respectively). Psychiatry comes from the people and therefore should be of the people," said Marcus.

Marcus considers herself to be in the third group of the Radical Therapy Movement.

Marcus said, "Anyone with enough training can be a psychiatrist. I am a psychiatrist and I am a high-school drop-out."

According to Marcus, there is nothing in radical psychiatry that cannot be questioned.

"Therapy means change not adjustment" is the slogan for radical psychiatry.

"All of the major institutions of our society which have to do with our consciousness deal primarily with the status quo" said Marcus. "This means 24 hours of pain."

Radical psychiatry is mostly done in groups. Marcus said long term one-to-one therapy doesn't work as well as groups do. Not only are groups less expensive, but the support, energy, and feedback from more than one person usually result in change faster than one-to-one therapy does. Groups also learn to function around a limited time period.

Marcus said radical psychiatry will always search for the kernel of truth in the paranoid fantasy to validate the fantasy, whereas traditional psychiatry will say that the person is projecting their feelings into another person resulting in the paranoia.

ment with the ratio well below the UMass average, Food and Agricultural Engineering, is well above the average for engineering programs.

Forestry and Wildlife Management

Progulske said his department refrained cutting back enrollments until it "just about broke our back."

To maintain the faculty-student ratios at a respective level, prospective Forestry and Wildlife majors were enrolled in a "counselling center" of the National Resources school, said Progulske.

Students in the "center" would fulfill department prerequisites before entering the desired program through a "selection process" based on different factors.

The department now enrolls about 550 majors in five specific programs: forestry, wildlife, fishery, wood technology, and an overview option, natural resources studies.

Progulske said the graduate student teaching assistants (TA) only assist the 18 faculty members, they do not teach.

He said the department has been operating as a "bare skeleton", depending on loyal faculty.

He said he has sent "continuous requests" for additional faculty to the dean's office. Whaley lists the department as an allocation priority. Progulske added at this moment it might not be timely to react to the provost's plan.

Veterinary and Animal Sciences

The demand for pre-veterinary courses at UMass has been "consistently" increasing, said department chairperson Thomas W. Fox.

The present faculty-student ratio stands at 30:1, which Fox said is "preposterous for a quality four-year education."

He said he could "utilize two to three more positions" and an additional TA for lab sections.

The department serves 113 Stockbridge majors, 354 four-year undergraduate majors, and 22 graduate students.

Plant Pathology

Chairperson Richard A. Rhode said although he is not familiar with the entire provost's plan, he doesn't think "the provost picked his (allocation) numbers out of a hat."

Rhode said his department numbers six faculty and 25 majors. He pointed out, however, that hundreds of students in other natural resource programs are taught "service courses" by the six professors.

With enrollments rising in these other departments, the teaching loads necessarily increase in Plant Pathology.

Although the department "hasn't turned too many (students) away, it's hard to tell" about the future, he said.

As far as requesting additional faculty, Rhode said he will "put in a plug ... when the occasion arrives."

Landscape Architecture and Regional Planning

Another department mentioned by Whaley for allocations, Landscaping Architecture and Regional Planning currently enrolls 560 to 600 majors. The faculty-student ratio has dropped in the last three years, said acting chairperson Paul W. Procopio. He estimates the present ratio to be 20:1.

Procopio said the department is looking for a new chairperson to head the 22 full-time and three part-time faculty.

Plant and Soil Sciences

Chairperson Franklin W. Southwick said he would like to fill all the vacancies in this department, but there is no place to put them.

He said the department is lacking in research facilities. Some "labs don't even have running water. Some are inferior to (those in) junior high schools."

Between the Stockbridge and four-year programs, Southwick said there are over 500 majors enrolled in the department.

He said he is down seven faculty positions. Some of the vacancies are due to the low salary, Southwick said.

Herter's after-hour lights shed their reflections on the FAC pond. (Staff photo by Steve Parrott)

Plant and Soil Sciences should receive at least one additional faculty member, according to Whaley's allocation-priority list.

Agricultural Experiment Station

The Agricultural Experiment Station's association director, John A. Naegele, said the provost plan will "neither make or break us."

He explained the station employs UMass faculty as researchers. Their salaries are comprised of "matching funds" between the federal and state government.

The station serves as a research vehicle for outside grants and scholarships," said Naegele.

There are currently 150 projects being undertaken by the station, he said.

"It is my understanding," said Naegele, that it (the provost plan) might be a benefit" to the station.

Food Science and Nutrition

FS&N chairperson Frederick J. Francis said although the "program is not suffering in quality", there is "no way to maintain it with the ratio as it is."

The problem can only be gradually eliminated, he said. "Not overnight."

Right now FS&N has only five faculty members to teach 135 students. Whaley figures the faculty student ratio for this undermanned program hovers around 46:1. He ranks FS&N number one for additional faculty allocations.

Francis conceded the department never should have allowed enrollments to expand so disproportionately with the faculty levels.

Francis said the department may "lose one, maybe another" faculty member because of morale problems caused by the teaching conditions.

"What can one do," he asked, citing the three-year-old salary freeze as another discouraging element in FS&N.

Francis said the provost's plan shows "fortitude." He noted it appears favorable to the School of Food and Natural Resources.

Hotel, Restaurant and Travel Administration

Second to FS&N in faculty increases, HRTA also has a high faculty-student ratio of 33:1. There are more than 500 majors in the department, with eight faculty members.

Chairperson Stevenson W. Fletcher said HRTA has just started a quota system of 50 freshmen, 50 off-campus transfers, and 50 inter-school transfer admissions. The 150 admitted represents about half the total demand for the school, Fletcher estimated.

Health Sciences — Division of Nursing

The UMass nursing program, which closed its admissions last fall, has been allocated three more positions by the provost's plan for fiscal year (FY) 1982.

Chairperson Ira Trail said her department had "nothing to react to" in the provost's plan, because a "blue ribbon committee" had also projected similar staff increases.

She explained this committee had studied the program during intersession and recommendations were given to the UMass administration.

This year, the Division of Nursing will graduate 204 seniors. By next year, only 77 seniors will be enrolled in the program. This drop in students also means a cut in the part-time faculty.

Trail said the department intends to keep the faculty-student ratio at the national average of 10:1 for undergraduates, and 5:1 for graduate students. There are 15 graduate students enrolled in the Division of Nursing.

With this faculty-student ratio in mind, Trail said the program will be "replacing (faculty) on basis of need." She said she is "very happy" with the three new positions.

Trail said although she'd like to re-open admissions immediately, she wasn't sure when the program would accept applications again.

Communication Disorders

This program will also receive three more positions in the next five years. Chairperson E. Harris Nober said his department of 10 faculty enrolls 225 undergraduates and 45 graduate students.

The faculty-student ratio is 32:1, which Nober says is high considering the nature of the clinically-oriented programs.

Enrollements have already been cut back from 400 students, said Nober. Using a quota system for acceptances, he said he is aiming for 200 undergraduates and 40 graduates students.

There is a heavy demand for the department courses, he said, particularly in the speech and language pathology program.

Nober said he was only familiar with the pages of the provost's plan dealing with Communications Disorders.

He said if he got the 2.6 positions the provost has projected for the department, "We would come closer to getting a release of the pressure we're feeling."

Faculty would have more time for research work while maintaining clinic supervision, he said.

"We could always use more (faculty)," reflected Nober. "But so could other departments."

The University is now committing itself to the needs and goals of departments, said Nober. He said he imagined the provost "arranged the allocations in a priority list," and added "that may sound biased, but it's my position."

School of Physical Education Professional Preparation

While the other departments in the School of Physical Education are either receiving additional allocations, or level projections, in the provost's plan, Professional Preparation in Physical Education is being cut one position.

Chairperson Arlan F. Barber, however, doesn't plan to appeal the decision.

"I'm not upset whatsoever," said Barber. "The total school of Physical Education has been treated quite well," he said, but quickly added, "that may be a minority opinion."

Barber explained his department has been gradually cutting its enrollment intentionally with the declining job market.

"The department, at one time, has an excess of 800 majors," said Barber. With a moral, ethical concern of the job market, the department "actively cut back enrollment," and lost corresponding resources and faculty, he said.

He noted five of the faculty who left transferred to the music department on campus. Others, he said, switched to different programs in physical education. A few, he said, left to go to other schools or personnel business.

The faculty now number 11, while there are about 300 majors. Barber said he hopes to drop the enrollemnt to 200.

He said he is not facing any fear of the allocation at this resource level. The department is at a more workable size, he said.

"You might say we're at fighting rate," said Barber. "It's a reasonable allocation."

Barber also said he felt the memo was "fair." Again noting his usual minority stand, Barber said he is considered "optimistic" in many ways.

Natural Sciences - Zoology

Zoology chairperson John D. Palmer said his department, which would be reduced from 32 positions to 31 in the provost's plan, said there has been a "substantial decline" in enrollments this semester.

There are now 5,000 students taking zoology courses. Undergraduate majors numer 586, graduate students 300.

He noted the decrease, estimated at 12 per cent, is the first major cut in recent years.

Palmer said he is "not as upset as a lot of people" about the provost's long-range faculty reallocation plan. He said he thinks the provost's plan gives faculty a chance to respond.

Reasons were given to him for denying some of his faculty tenure next year, he said. Presently, 79 per cent of the staff are tenured.

Palmer, however, declined to comment further about the impact of the provost's plan on the Zoology department, terming it "touchy."

Meeting

The chairperson of the Undergraduate Student Senate's Academic Affairs Committee will be meeting this afternoon with Provost Paul L. Puryear. Richard Baga said he and Brian J. DeLima, senate speaker will be seeking explanations to parts of the provost's long range plan for reallocating faculty at UMass.

The meeting will be discussed with interested students at Monday's 4:30 session of the Academic Affairs Committee.

Jewish holocaust to be remembered

By MARY ANN MAYNARD
Collegian Staff

It has been 32 years, but the horror is still with us.

Six million Jews were sent to the gas chambers from 1933 to 1945 in Adolf Hitler's insane attempt to wipe out the Jewish people, and thereby create a pure German race.

Prompted by the Brandeis Hillel Holocaust Remembrance Committee and Rabbi Axelrad, Gov. Michael S. Dukakis has proclaimed April 15 the official state observance of Holocaust Remembrance Day.

Dukakis has asked for one minute of silent meditation at 10 a.m. today for people to reflect on the tragedy of the Holocaust, and renew their struggle against such oppression.

According to Dukakis's proclamation, " ... the mass murder and atrocities committed against all people during the Holocaust, 1933-1945, constitutes an unprecedented act of human wickedness which we must never allow to recur ... it is imperative that human beings everywhere be sensitive to and mindful of the consequences of tyranny and oppression, hatred and cruelty."

The UMass B'nai B'rith Hillel Foundation has set aside this week for Holocaust Remembrance. A multi media show, "Jewish Life In Eastern Europe Between the World Wars", a lecture by Dr. Leonard Glick at Hampshire College, "Perspectives on the Holocaust", and a film, "Night and Fog", began the observances for the five college community. The climax of Holocaust Remembrance week was the memorial ceremony held last night, followed by the film "Let My People Go".

According to the Brandeis Holocaust Remembrance Committee, this day is not only for Jews, but for all people.

"If all this is forgotten and dismissed, Hitler will have succeeded posthumously in his final solution."

FAC will receive walkway barriers

By RICH LAFAUCI
Collegian Staff

Barriers will be erected in places around the Fine Arts Center (FAC) next week to prevent vehicle access to the walkways and the area opening onto the campus pond (the breezeway), according to Bill Lambert, University Landscape Architect.

"The structural integrity of the building is being destroyed," Lambert said. "There is a small chance that the building could collapse under the weight overloads. We also plan to put up barriers around the library for the same reason. The only way we can stop the vehicles is to put up physical barriers," he said.

The offending vehicles are "mostly the Campus Police, the mail vans and the Physical Plant vehicles. Other offenders are "night-time partiers" who park overlooking the campus pond - Fritz Steinway, Director of the FAC.

David Letters, director of Publicity and Advertising for the FAC, said severe damage is being done to rooms beneath the walkways.

"These areas are not meant to support the weight of a vehicle, and as a result, the ceilings are cracking and leaking. This is the same thing that happened to the Campus Center six years ago," Letters said.

Fritz Steinway, Director of the FAC, said the offending vehicles are "mostly the Campus Police, the mail vans and Physical Plant vehicles." Other offenders are "night-time partyers" who park overlooking the campus pond.

The barriers will be upright metal poles sunk into the concrete, similar to those between the Campus Center and the parking garage, said Lambert.

"These barriers are just temporary until we can put up permanent ones. We hope to do this this summer provided we can get the funds," he said.

Permanent barriers will consist of concrete benches and planters between the reflecting pools, as well as trees, small hedges and plants rooted in cut out areas of the concrete mall, said Lambert.

"Work was supposed to begin yesterday," said Letters, "but we were granted a one week moratorium. It is not necessary to tear up the FAC to put in the temporary barriers. Aesthetically, this will take a lot away from the FAC, and the scars will still be very noticeable after the permanent barriers are constructed. We are also afraid of temporary becoming permanent."

If the temporary barriers are installed according to plan, 19 poles will be placed across the breezeway, six across the north end of the walkway, and three across the south end.

"These holes required for the poles cannot be patched well enough to erase the scars. What we want to see are temporary barriers in the form of concrete benches and planters," Letters said.

PIRG checks prices

By PAT BEINAR
Collegian Staff

Local supermarkets will be investigated for violations of Unit Pricing Regulations on 500 products by campus Public Interest Research Group (PIRG) volunteers after their training session on Monday.

In cooperation with the State Attorney General's Office, students will be briefed on current Unit Pricing Regulations and trained in surveying techniques. They will determine whether the pricing is understandable, in clear view or hidden from the consumer and if it is up to date.

A significant number of violations were found by PIRG's first 1973 investigation. Following the report, Unit Pricing Regulations were amended to improve their effectiveness.

Since then, a high turnover of foods on supermarket shelves and lax enforcement procedures point out the need for an updated investigation according to PIRG.

The 1971 Unit Pricing Law was designed to facilitate quick, accurate price comparisons and guard against deceptive packaging and confusing jargon. Massachusetts food bills can be reduced 10 to 15 per cent by Unit Pricing, only if supermarkets display the appropriate tags on all items.

Students interested in participating in this project can meet Monday at 7:30 in 801 Campus Center, or contact the PIRG office.

NW Road plan criticized

By CHRIS BOURNE
Collegian Staff

Northwest Road Committee chairperson Merle Howes said the state Department of Public Works (DPW) has rejected one part of the committee's proposal and has "serious doubts" about another.

Howes made the statement during an informational meeting held for Amherst residents last night at the Marks Meadows School to explain the committee's proposals.

Howes said DPW officials, including Associate Commissioner Thomas Barlow, met with members of the committee Tuesday.

"The DPW said that what they'd like most to do is to get out of Amherst. They said they were pulled into a project that had limited public support," said Howes.

During a telephone interview yesterday, Barlow said, "We've presented several plans to the University and to the Town. Out of the clear blue sky, the town meeting rejected last fall, a proposal that was 90 per cent complete. We've spent about $100,000 of the taxpayers money. Any major plan change now would mean that we'd have to start all over again."

Barlow also said DPW would terminate their design contract unless the town meeting comes up with a definite proposal this time.

DPW flatly rejected the proposed extension of Commonwealth Ave. to North Village (recommendation 2) Howes said.

Barlow said the extension is nothing more than "a driveway" and the "DPW doesn't build driveways."

The extension is the second of three committee proposals that involve major construction. They will be presented at the town meeting next month as part of the committee's final report.

Howes also said DPW has serious doubts about the Commonwealth Ave.-Rte. 116 (recommendation 1) connection.

"They said that they're worried about the closeness of the proposed intersection to the Meadow St.-Rte. 116 intersection."

DPW also said there would have to be a lot of public support in order for them to build the Taylor Farm Road (recommendation 3). According to Howes, they said they're past the days where they just went in and built without consulting the community.

During last night's meeting, several of the 30 people who attended expressed opposition to the proposed roads.

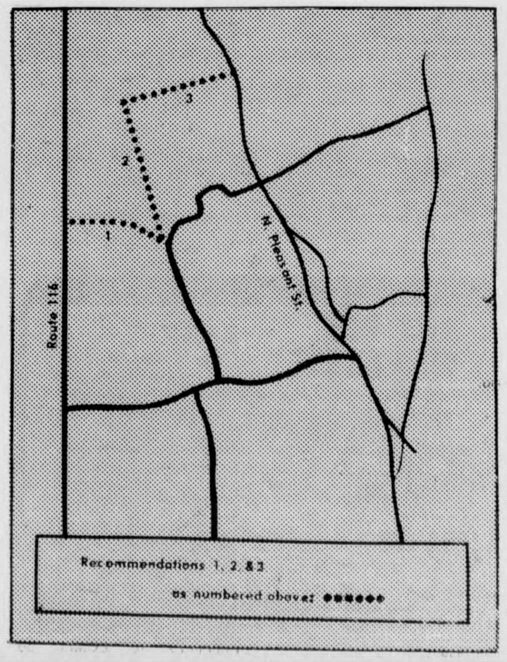
Many of the objections centered around the safety of children walking to Marks Meadow School from North Village, Pufton, and homes in the area. The children would have to cross the proposed Taylor Farm Road-North Pleasant St. intersection.

Committee member Richard Minear said it might not be possible to get a traffic light at this intersection because the traffic volumes on the Taylor Farm Road wouldn't meet DPW requirements.

Gerald Grady, also a member of the committee, disagreed with Minear, saying he felt DPW would take into account the special circumstances.

Other residents felt the roads weren't required.

"I certainly don't support any road touching North Pleasant St. On one hand the University is declining and on the other we're trying to build bigger roads," said one woman.



Hasaan Dawkins in Concert at Hampshire College

Hasaan Dawkins, a New York City jazz saxophonist, will be giving a concert at Hampshire College Dining Commons at 8:00 p.m., this Friday, April 15th. Dawkins' music has deep roots in the revolutionary music experience of the 1960's — roots deep in the black ghetto experience. Raised in Watts (L.A.) California, the musician relocated to New York City to learn more about the music he was playing and to make contact with its main stream influences. His major influences are Shepp, 'Trane and Albert Ayler.

Dawkins is an experimental saxophonist (who plays many reeds including soprano, tenor and contrabass clarinet). His 'voice' is full of raspy energy and unexpected surprises. His approach is passionate and emotional more than intellectual and meditative. He plays reality and you really feel he has lived it. When asked by an interviewer trying to pigeonhole his music, he replied: "It's about shock." It logically follows, then that this music is political, aggressive and unpredictable.

From Dawkin's background, one sees he has covered a wide range of musical experiences. After an internship in an L.A. big band, he has played small clubs and coffeehouses, including a recent date at the ENVIRON in Soho. He has sat in and jammed with numerous artists, including Jimi Hendrix, Earl Freeman (Volta 77), Billy Bang Trio, John Betsch and others.... Come and open your head and ears to his musical experience.

News from the 'Motherland'

Rhodesian gov't. still has not learned

(UPI) — The Rhodesian government also ordered all Rhodesians aged 38 to 50 to register for military service. The order is a forerunner to a new drive to absorb older white, mixed race and Asian men into the security forces, which is fighting an escalating war against black guerrillas. Blacks are not included.

(UPI) — In Salisbury, Rhodesia, Prime Minister Ian Smith said that unless the invasion by Zairean rebels was checked, the Soviet Union is "going to go on winning in Africa" and "the free world is going to go on losing."

Smith said the invasion "is an unhealthy development and I seriously hope that the free world is coming to its senses and beginning to take more cognizance of this situation.

President Idi Amin

(UPI) — In Kampala, Ugandan President Idi Amin fired a cabinet minister and warned others they'll go too unless they "pull up their socks." The official dismissed was Saul Semakula, acting secretary to the president and acting minister of natural resources. He was accused of failing to perform his duties satisfactorily.

Elsewhere in Afrika

(UPI) — In Addis, Ababa, Ethiopia, thousands of Ethiopians, some carrying sword, spears, sticks and stones, rallied in Revolution Square to demonstrate their readiness to repel a reported Sudanese invasion.

The mass rally followed an appeal to the Ethiopian people Tuesday night by head of state Lt. Col. Mengis tu Haile Mariam to prepare for the defense of their "motherland from an invading army of neighboring Sudan."

Graduating seniors

Come June, and we will be deprived of seeing one of god's finest creations walk the grounds of UMass for a long time to come. The person I'm talking about is Rosylin "Roz" Paige, a Gemini, who is in her last semester here at UMass.

Born on June 17th 1955, "Roz" went to Rains-Cenetary Elementary School in South Carolina from the 1st to the 5th grade before she joined Jefferson High in New York. While in high school, "Roz" played basketball at varsity level in her sophomore and junior years, and was a Senator to be reckoned with when she was a member of the school's Student Senate.

"Roz" first 'graced' the campus grounds of UMass in the fall of 1973 where she will soon graduate from with a degree in sociology. During the summer of '73 she worked for the Neighbour-Hood Youth Crop with kids from the age of 6-13 and in the summers of '74 and '75 she worked at the Psychriatric Institute for Disturbed Children in New York City.

At UMass, "Roz" has been working with Drum magazine for the past two years and an active organizer for her dorm in Coolidge Tower. "Roz" plans to work at the Metropolitan Hospital in New York for a year, after graduation, and then plans to go to Grad. School for a Master's degree in Special Education at either U.C.L.A. or Pace Univeristy in New York.

The staff of Black Affairs you "Roz" the very best in your future.

Annie's Poetry Corner

Black Affairs is pround to announce a new addition to our pages.

Annie Carpenter, a UMass student, will furnish poems dealing with the various aspects of life. Carpenter feels that "to find one's own reality is to find one's self." Another major theme of Carpenter's is that, "freedom is to know the sensitivity of one's self, and the courage to be it."

We hope our readers will be pleased with our new addition, we certainly are!

We are a matter of perception
From the first time my eyes graced your presence
I knew you were deep
The first time we touched
I felt a shiver
in my newly touched unfulfilled soul

I knew we could be made whole
The first time I was alone with you
I felt you make me your woman and I accepted you, my love, as my man
We shared spaces
We matched

I have waited so long for a man like you to come along
To blossom into fullness
I want you with me under that midnight sun
I want to feel your touch at the brightest of dawn
I got so much to give
Will you accept my love

We can live and give for each other
I have dreamed of your smile
For your smile
I will walk for miles
We should be free with life for life
We are love
We are us

'Quad Day' set for April 30

By ARNOLD WARSHAW
Collegian Staff

Plans for Quad Day, to be held on Saturday, April 30 at the Northeast Area Quad, have been completed it was announced at last night's Northeast Area Government (NEAG) meeting.

Obtaining a liquor license so that beer can be sold is the only detail the NEAG planners of the event are waiting to get final approval on.

Quad Day will be one big party, beginning at 1:00 p.m. and going until midnight. Three bands, The Fools, The Chislers, and Renegade will provide the music. If the money is available, two jugglers will be hired to provide amusement.

Jazz duos in weekend concerts

By JACK CAHILL
Collegian Staff

The series of contemporary jazz music concerts put on by Loft Jazz North continues this weekend with two duo concerts. Saxophonist-flutist Julius Hemphill and cellist Abdul Waddad will collaborate on Saturday night and trumpeter Leo Smith will combine with bassist Wes Brown. The concerts will be held at the Hampshire College Red Barn starting at 8:30 p.m. Admission for both events is $2.

Both concerts feature musicians who are at the heart of the new "avant garde" directions being pioneered in the lofts and musicians clubs in New York, Chicago, St. Louis, and other cities. To call their music experimental is wrong; these players are taking their music in a direction that is a logical outgrowth of the history of jazz music, and although the medium is improvised, their expertise is such that they are continually aware of the flow and the form of the music they so spontaneously create.

Julius Hemphill has recorded for Arista Records and his own label MBari, and his experience is more than considerable. His commitment and determination are astonishing and he is, as he says, "simply a man trying to steer himself through his own confusion so that he can communicate in a sincere voice with other human beings."

Leo Smith is a seminal figure in the new music, on a level with Lester Bowie and other modern trumpet pioneers. Both Wes Brown and Abdul Waddad are important voices on their instruments with much to say and many ways to say it. Both collaborations are highly suggested for a view of truly modern musical directions.

BOG digests food complaint proposal

By JEAN CONLEY
Collegian Staff

Campus Center Board of Governors (BOG) member Steven Later last night proposed a formal channel for food complaints in the Campus Center-Student Union Complex.

Later said he "had problems" with five or six questions on a survey distributed this week by Campus Center Food Services. The survey asked questions on Food Services users' attitudes toward the quality and amount of food served, and relations with employes and management.

A complaint channel would be a medium for non-users of the Food services Later said. One such group is Hillel, a Jewish organization which has petitioned the BOG several times for exemption to the Campus Center policy of not allowing groups to serve their own food in the Campus Center.

Earthfoods is the only group presently exempted from the Food Services Policy.

In other action, Brian J. DeLima, Student Senate speaker, urged consolidation of funds from the Program Council, a BOG sponsored group that programs musical, artistic and theatrical events in the Campus Center, with the University Program Council (UPC).

The UPC programs events throughout the University.

An alternative site for a student check-cashing facility is the subject of a new study by the Board. Members of the BOG will make a cost analysis of various locations on campus. One site mentioned was the space that is now the Bursar's office in Whitmore Administration Building. There has been speculation in recent months of terminating services at that office.

In other social news, it was announced that tickets are now on sale for the Northeast Spring Semi-Formal Dinner Dance, to be held Saturday evening, April 22 at the Campus Center Auditorium.

Tickets will be sold today and Monday at Worcester dining commons and at TIX in the Student Union until Tuesday at 4:30 p.m.

Also last night, Roger Sturgis, coordinator of the Committee to Stop Amherst Towing asked NEAG representatives to support the group's grive to get a student run towing service on campus.

In other matters, the Northeast politicos agreed to establish a committee that will re-write the NEAG constitution.

The meeting ended with all NEAG members writing letters to their state representatives expressing their dissatisfaction with Gov. Michael S. Dukakis' proposed level funding plan.

'Sidney's Window' shines

THEATRE REVIEW

"The Sign in Sidney Brustein's Window"
Curtain Theatre F.A.C.
Directed by: Doris Abramson

By ELAINE PARKER
Collegian Staff

The University Ensemble Theatre's production of The Sign in Sidnay Brustein's Window, opened last Friday and will continue through Saturday at the Curtain Theatre in the Fine Arts Center.

This production was a moving, sensitive piece about a young couple living in Greenwich village. The play revolves around Sidney Brustein, an intellectual who has lost all his former idealism and commitment. He is now trying to instill the meaning into his life that he lost years ago when young and involved in various causes. Instead of gaining any meaning, he moves from one failure to another.

His wife, Iris, an aspiring actress, is trying to find her identity apart from Sidney. She has become his whipping boy and he lashes out at her in his self-contempt and bitterness.

The thing that's most impressive about this production was its truly ensemble cohesiveness. Though Sidney was played by a professional actor, Jack Gianino, all the University players were equally strong and realistic. I did feel the show started slowly on Friday night but when it picked up, they always worked up to Gianino's acting and energy level and so were equally effective.

Gianino was wonderful as the cynical Sidney Brustein. He was fascinating to watch because of his distinctive stage presence. The variety in his voice was quite effective. The way he controlled the different levels and volume in his voice made the audience emphathize with Sidney and drew them into the action of the play.

Susan J. Danizio's Iris was alive and faceted. Her movements and facial expressions were always different and interesting. Although she seemed a bit stiff in the first few moments on stage, she then relaxed and gave an assured performance. She was equally as realistic on stage playing opposite Gianino, which is an accomplishment for an amateur actress.

Mavis Bryson was convincingly played by Elizabeth Redler-Thompson. One example of her life-like portrayal was the scene with her and Sidney in Act II. The feeling of life and romanticism it held was remarkable.

Another of the convincing performances of this production was the scene in which Gloria Parados, played by Ronna Levy, is trying to come to grips with her life. Failing, she commits suicide. The tension built by this scene was clearly felt by all.

Jeff Avick is fairly good as Alton Scales, but I thought his performance a bit static. At times he performed very realistically and at others he lacked the energy level required to hold the audience's full attention.

Doris Abramson directed this production with feeling and strength and has done justice to Lorraine Hansberry's marvelous work. The play exudes a life of its own and becomes more than just a performance, but, as Abramson states, it becomes "a warning to those of us who are young as Sidney once was and who will be growing older as Sidney is doing. Where will we be ten or fifteen years from now? Where will we be when the bubble (or realism) bursts?" Will we be as Sidney says he is, "a fool who believes that hurt is desperation and desperation is — energy and energy moves things...?"

Track meet extraordinaire

By MIKE BERGER
Collegian Staff

Some people wonder how 6,000 people can be crowded into a quarter-mile radius of Southwest. Tomorrow, starting at 10 a.m., anywhere from 700-800 men and women track collegiate competitors from all over New England will convene at Llewlyn Derby Track by the UMass baseball field for a track extravaganza that has never been seen before in New England for the second annual UMass Relays.

"We expect anywhere from 2500 to 3500 spectators to watch the best of New England collegiate track competition if the weather is good," said meet coordinator and UMass assistant track coach Arnie Morse.

A year ago tomorrow, the official temperature for the 1976 UMass Relays reached an all-time high of 92 degrees. By 6 p.m. the temperature was cooling to a pleasant 85 degrees and Derby Track looked more like the remains of a spring concert than anything else.

Picnic tables, a huge tent, radios and food vendors, were common last year and should be out again this year as the weatherman is predicting sunny temperatures in the 70's. With an estimated 45-50 men's and women's teams competing in almost 50 track and field events, it is almost impossible to keep a team score.

"Winning is secondary in this meet," said head UMass track coach Ken O'Brien. It's a chance for all track competitors whether collegiate, former alumni, students or professors who have any love for track to compete. But for sure, the competition won't suffer," he said.

Jan Merrill, the no. 1 women distance runner in the US, and Olympic participant in addition to Judy Fontaine, Olympic trial finalist in the pentathlon will compete.

College Division All-American Mark Duncan from Boston State and one of collegiates best steeplechasers, along with 9.5 BC and New England best sprinter Phil Harris, 3rd best 35 lb. weight thrower in the US-Wayne Dorrigan, and Olympic trialist Bill Johnston in the shot put will also arrive to compete.

In the distance events, All-Americans from Providence, Northeastern, and UMass will "go head to head" in competition. From Providence Mick O'Shea, Dan Dillon, and John Treacy, all of whom were the nucleus of the Friars' team which finished fourth in cross-country in the nation are expected to form a distance medley relay against NU's All-American Jon and Bob Flora, Bruce Bickford, Mark Lech, and Bruce Mortimer.

UMass is not without its share of performers as All-Americans John McGrail and sophomore Mike Quinn, and New England outdoor championship finalists half miler and UMass captain Jim Hunt, 440-Joe Martens, 440 Intermediate hurdlers — John Richards and Mark Healy, pole vaulter Ted Power, shotputter, javelin, and discus thrower Ron Melkonian are expected to show up for action.

"When we set up this meet, we wanted to establish all the good aspects of New England track and have them all here for one meet. In this meet, competitors of equal ability will go against each other so the great kids will go at each other in a championship style competition while still giving other competitors an equal shot," said O'Brien.

O'Brien said that unlike dual meets, relays will be a major part of the meet which will make the meet unique. "In dual meets, we can't have enough of relay competition which is the most exciting aspect of track and in relay meets such as the BC Relays, people complain there isn't enough of individual meet. Saturday, we have something for everybody," he said.

With events starting at 10:15 in the morning and probably lasting to 5:30, the Relays should be the center of sport attention on campus Saturday.

An estimated 700-800 men and women participants will jam Derby Track tomorrow for the UMass Relays. Events will start at 10 a.m. and last till 5:30 p.m. (Staff photo by Marilyn Mankowsky)

Carter axes rebate

WASHINGTON (UPI) — President Carter, admitting political considerations were also a factor, withdrew his $50 tax rebate proposal yesterday on grounds the improving economy no longer needs the stimulus.

In an appearance in the White House press room, Carter personally announced the decision that followed two days of closed meetings with his economic, political and congressional aides.

"Yes, there were

"The overwhelming thing, though, was economic. We could have passed the economic stimulus package in its entirety had we decided to go ahead with it."

But he acknowledged that "no doubt" many Democratic congressional leaders had "lost their enthusiasm" for it. The leaders had said the House-passed rebate proposal was in serious trouble in the Senate. "I've been accused of a lot of things," Carter said. "I don't or of being too quick to compromise."

"I did not back off because I feared political defeat."

Carter said that last December, when he and the Democratic congressional leadership hammered out the two-year, $31 billion economic stimulus package, the rebate proposal was justified because "unemployment was 8 per cent, the economy was dormant, to say the least, and inflationary

Ex-assassination group head accused of leaking info

HARTFORD (AP) — The chief counsel of the House assassinations subcommittee, who criticized the panel for news leaks, was guilty of the same thing the day he resigned, a panel member said yesterday.

Rep. Christopher Dodd, D-Conn., said he was disappointed that Richard Sprague attacked the panel recently when he stepped down as chief counsel. Dodd met with reporters at a Hartford news [illegible] discuss the progress the assassinations of President Kennedy and Rev. Martin Luther King.

Dodd said that during Sprague's final news conference he revealed some "not at all conclusive evidence" linking others to James Earl Ray, the convicted assassin of King.

"He turned around and did the same thing he was accusing the committee of," Dodd said. "To have him turn around and take pot shots at members who had defended him was a little disappointing, to say the least."

Conceptions and misconceptions

> "Woman is... wondering why we can have live color telecasts of the moon's surface, but still no truly simple, humane, safe method of birth control."
> "Barbarous Rituals" Sisterhood is Powerful

Here it is, 1977, the year after the 200th birthday of our country. Here we are, the most technologically advanced nation in the world. And here we are, still treating countless misinformed uninformed, or sometimes unwilling to be informed women each year for unwanted pregnancy.

We can blow up the world in two minutes if we really try. We have developed the ultimate in synthetic fabrics and plastic materials. We can send messages around the world and into outer space with a few minutes' effort. But we still can't free women from the "tyranny of their biology" as Shulamith Firestone once wrote.

Sure, I'm sure you've all heard at some point or another something about the Pill, IUD, diaphragm, condoms, morning after pill, etc. But what exactly do we know specifically about any of these processes? How do they work? What effects do they have on our own or our children's bodies? Doctors and health clinics vary in their willingness and their honesty about sharing this information with us. The medical profession still does not have answers to questions such as, what does the IUD actually do? Is the Pill a carcinogen?

Indeed, in the case of many female birth control devices, testing procedures have been hasty and inadequate, and devices such as the Dalkon Shield, are released before researchers realize what dangers are inherent in the use of such devices.

Furthermore, statistics indicate that the funds available for research in the field of birth control have fallen off, particularly since 1974. Research on male contraception has been scanty, and when proposals are brought forth, they receive negative or incredulous reactions. "A male Pill? Oh no — there are too many risks involved!" What about the risks involved with women?

We should not limit our focus to the medical profession in regard to this problem. Families and educational institutions have kept much of this information from us, especially as children and as teenagers. parents and teachers talk about sex in very vague, "mystical" adjectives, or not at all. I remember the scare tactics that my junior high school used to introduce our eighth grade class to sex; they showed us "training films" on venereal disease and pregnancy.

Recently, there has been an increase in the number of teenage pregnancy, which some people blame on the loosening of sexual mores and attitudes. These persons would rather return sexuality to the closed room and the hushed tones with which it should be addressed. Instead of recognizing the changing values, and recognizing both male and female sexuality rather than dealing with themselves and their children honestly, they choose to ignore these changes and hope they will go away peacefully.

Conversely, the "sexual revolution" has often been used to women's disadvantage. I have talked with other women who felt that the freer access to birth control precipitated an expectation by their peers (often both male and female) that they go to bed with any men they happen to date. This same kind of pressure can exist for the man who must answer to the question, "Did you score?" when he returns from a night out. Some say it's no longer as easy to have a platonic relationship with persons of the opposite sex. Even when two persons want to have a sexual relationship, the information they want concerning birth control, sexuality and abortion, is either inaccessible, or their queries about such subjects invoke personal attacks, teasing and questions about one's sexual relationships.

It's a difficult thing to talk about, difficult to confront within ourselves and others, especially if our backgrounds have been sketchy and our information buried in myths. A large part of the women's movement must include the ability of women to take control of their own bodies. We need to learn as much as we can about ourselves, caring for ourselves and other women, our sexuality, and the attitudes and common perceptions of women in the medical institutions. Self-help clinics are opening up all around the country. Books are available that will answer general questions about women's health. As long as we cannot control our bodies, any control we have over our social and political lives becomes rather meaningless.

Invitation to volunteer

To the Editor:

Ms. Sain's commentary concerning the recruitment problems she faced with the Boltwood-Belchertown Project was a bit disturbing to me, although I can empathize with her frustrations. I seriously doubt that she has a full understanding of the mechanics and dynamics of the volunteer project. As a supervisor in the project, I can identify with volunteer problems, as well as understand some of the overwhelming responsibilities that supervisors must deal with in terms of volunteer participation. I regret that Ms. Sains ran into so much difficulty in attempting to volunteer in the Project.

in order to remedy the situation somewhat, I am willing to accept Ms. Sains in my Adaptive Physical Activities Program which meets on Tuesday and Thursday evenings and Saturday afternoons. Even though it is late in the semester, ! will personally see to it that Ms. Sains receives a proper orientation and a quality volunteer experience. This invitation to volunteer is also open to any other student in the 5 college area who wishes to participate in my program. My telephone number is 253-2805. If I'm not in, leave a message and number. If there's no answer, call Belchertown State School at extension 296. I am looking forward to your participation.

Puryear Report criticized

To the Editor:

Provost Paul Puryear's 5-year plan, which intends to eliminate the Asian Studies Program and Slavic Languages Department by 1982, is wholly at odds with the Academic Program Review Task Force Report of November 2, 1976. The Task Force, headed by former Acting-Provost Dean Alfange, was made up of a cross-section of the entire UMass community. At the expense of $480,000 and many hours of work by deans, faculty and students over a period of two years, the Task Force Report produced an evaluation of the needs of all departments at UMass.

This report represents a genuine long-term program, which has been ignored by Provost Puryear. Within the School of Humanities and Fine Arts, seven programs including Asian Studies received recommendations from the Task Force Report for funding to be continued at current levels. Despite this, their fates under Provost Puryear's plan vary as follows:

Art, Comparative Literature, Music	5 per cent increases
Linguistics	no change
French and Italian	18 per cent decreases
Philosophy	20 per cent decrease
Asian Studies	100 per cent decrease

Five other programs in Humanities and Fine Arts received lower ratings by the Academic Program Review Task Force Report than the above seven programs. Yet, their decreases under Provost Puryear's plan do not consistently reflect the ratings of the Task Force Report. Thus, certain programs receive much worse treatment under Provost Puryear's plan than other programs which may have been rated lower by the Task Force Report, Provost Puryear replied, "None at all." After the meeting he told a senior faculty member that he had not even read the report.

Although Provost Puryear submitted his plan to President Robert Wood by February 15, he only submitted it to the deans in a memo dated March 24. Therefore many departments did not receive notification of the plan until March 30. Having waited over a month to send his plan to the deans, the Provost then asked for their reactions to his plan by April 15, three weeks later. We feel that this delay was intentional to prevent the departments from coming up with organized responses by the tight deadline.

Function of rhetoric

To the Editor:

David R. Canton's letter of April 12 was incorrect only in its closing statement. He held the only function of rhetoric to be to "make the useless who spout it feel useful". I disagree. Rhetoric also serves those with well constructed, logical opinions, as Mr. Canton illustrated in his well put letter about the students versus the administration issue.

Money over responsibility?

To the Editor:

In reference to the Collegian's policy editorial of last Friday which only said, in all those words, that money means more to the Board of Editors than the feelings of the offended women's community. The Collegian's lack of 'responsibility and sensitivity' is made up for by its distastefulness.

Tim Struggle

Imperialism in Southern Africa: The Soviet presence

To the Editor:

Fred Curtis, in his recent Collegian editorial, claims that the Soviet arms and Cuban troops in Angola are there in support of struggles for national liberation and self-determination. Is this true? Let's examine the nature of Soviet support in the light of some of their other recent actions:

— Was it support for national liberation that led the Soviets to refuse to recognize the Royal Government of National Union of Cambodia for three years, recognizing instead the U.S. installed puppet clique of Lon Nol? Was this why the Soviet state insurance agency Gosstrakh went so far as to insure arm shipments to the Lon Nol clique?

— Was it support for the right of nations to self-determination that caused the Soviet Union to invade the sovereign state of Czechoslovakia in 1968?

— Are the New Tsars demonstrating their staunch support for China's independence by stationing 1,200,000 troops in offensive positions on the Chinese border? 300,000 of these troops militarily occupy the territory of the People's Republic of Mongolia, a nation of just 1.2 million people.

The role of the U.S.S.R. today is an important question. This is especially so because our "own" rulers in the U.S. take advantage of every act of aggression, every violation of human rights on the part of the New Tsars of Russia, to justify their own acts of aggression, support for fascist dictatorships, and war preparations — all done in the name of fighting communism and opposing the Soviet menace.

Today, the Soviet Union is no longer a socialist country led by the working class, but has degenerated into a fascist dictatorship, based on the capitalist system of exploitation and wage slavery. It is for this reason that the Russian ruling class is forced, much as the capitalist rulers of this country are, to reach out to expand their empire, seeking constantly to bring new lands, new markets, and new peoples under their heavy heel.

Take the events in Angola last spring. Curtis states that "Cuban troops and Soviet arms in Angola came in response to the U.S. supported invasion of Angola by South African troops". As a matter of fact, the Russians were sending substantial military supplies to the group they were backing [the MPLA], 6 months before the first arms shipment reached the rival faction the U.S. was supporting [the FNLA]. At the Soviets bidding, Cuban troops arrived in early August and Soviet intervention dramatically increased in early October, all before the massive South African invasion occurred on October 25.

But much more important is the nature and intent of the Soviet intervention in the first place. Russian assistance to the Angolan liberation forces from 1960 to 1974, while they were fighting Portuguese Colonialism was about 70 million dollars. During the few months of the Angolan civil war, that amount shop up to well over $400 million. As the price for their "aid" the Soviets have already forced economic concessions like buying Angolan coffee at 38 per cent of the world price, and getting fishing rights in Angolan waters. In addition to thousands of Cuban troops still remaining in Angola, there are thousands of Cuban and some East German "economic advisors" there to help set up the economy. Africans killing Africans. This is the situation the Soviet Union helped to create in Angola because this opened the door to their political influence and economic penetration of that country and enabled them to use it as a stepping stone to do the same throughout Southern Africa.

The point here is not that soviet social-imperialism is in some way worse than U.S. imperialism. For decades U.S. backed Portuguese colonialism brutally ripped off the wealth of the Angolan People, just as today U.S. backed white settler states in Rhodesia and South Africa murder and exploit the Black majorities there. The point is that both superpowers are out to protect and expand their spheres of influence, and will use whatever tactics best serve their interests. The U.S. is not incapable of giving "aid" to a liberation movement — take for instance the $300 thousand Union Carbide offered to donate to the liberation forces in Rhodesia. And the Soviet Union is not above dealing directly with a racist government like the Smith regime — a few weeks ago it was revealed that they had been defying the U.N. sanctioned economic embargo and trading with the Rhodesian government for several years.

In one sense, Fred, you were right. Many of the Black African states, and the liberation forces in various countries are refusing to be dominated — by either superpower. And while they may accept some aid from the U.S. or U.S.S.R., this does not automatically make them some kind of obedient puppet. But it is exactly because they are determined to be free of any foreign domination, that these forces rely mainly on their own efforts, drawing their strength from the broad masses of people in their respective countries. It is in this way that the independent African states will remain independent, and the liberation forces of Rhodesia, South Africa or anywhere else for that matter, will succeed in carrying their struggle through to victory. Relying on one superpower to defeat the other is a death trap. And we must realize that while the people of Southern Africa deal blow after blow to the apartheid governments and their U.S. backers, the New Tsars will bend every effort to pimp off these struggles and worm their way in as the new imperialist masters of these countries. This is why the Revolutionary Student Brigade feels that the correct slogan for the American people to raise in support of the struggle there is: U.S. OUT OF SOUTHERN AFRICA — SUPERPOWERS HANDS OFF!

And because we think this is a crucial question facing us, we would be glad to publicly debate Mr. Curtis, or anyone else who feels that this demand is not correct, on the role of the Soviet Union and Cuba in Africa and around the world.

Trilateral Commission: Elitism in action

Americans have long been exposed to theories of an elite class which dominates the inner-workings of the political system. We accept the fact that those who control the policy making functions of our government are drawn from the upper levels of the economic and social hierarchy. Yet for the most part we reject theories of a conspiracy among these elite to move policy making in a direction which enhances their position in society. Well it's time to throw off this skeptical attitude, it's time to address the reality of in whose interest public policy decisions are made.

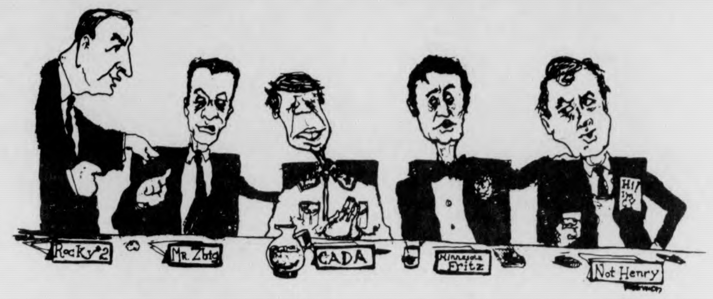
This idea of a power elite is best characterized by a group which is right now dominating the policies of the Carter Administration; the Trilateral Commission, a body whose absence from the press, writes Seven Days columnist Jon Steinberg, rivals the status of sex in Victorian England.

The Trilateral Commission is an elite body of some 200 North American, West European and Japanese capitalists. Its members include prominent bankers, multinational corporation heads, corporate lawyers, academics and a few politicians. They also boast a number of "former members" whom today have found a new home in the Carter Administration.

The president himself if a former Trilateralist, as is Secretary of State Vance, Defense Secretary Brown, Treasury Secretary Michael Blumenthal, National Security Advisor Zbigniew Brzezinski, and a local favorite, Lucy Benson.

Interestingly enough, and an indication of just how well these individuals have masked their background, witness the fact that the Valley Advocate ran a front page story in this week's issue on Benson. Ms. Benson, former Secretary of Human Services in Massachusetts is now the Carter Administration's Undersecretary of State for Security Assistance. The Advocate proved itself to be as naive as the rest of us have been about such matters when its reporter, Stephanie Kraft wrote, "Benson is straighforward and not the least bit defensive about the fact that she has little background in military technology."

That is if you leave aside Ms. Benson's stint on the Trilateral Commission where such subjects are treated as casually and matter of factly as we treat the subject of pot. The Advocate hurt its "radical credibility quotient" in failing to mention this crucial point. Former trilateralist Benson's duties include grants and military supplies to foreign nations, as well as policy decisions on arm ssales and foreign security decisions. One might paraphrase these duties by saying, 'she is making the world safe for U.S. corporate and economic interest,' lest there be any doubt that once a Trilateralist, always a Trilateralist.



The Trilateral Commission had its roots in the pocketbook of David Rockefeller. It was set up to foster the establishment dialogue between capitalists powers in Western Europe, Japan and the United States, the Trilateralists. Their view is that the world is in a "crisis" situation, as Brzezinski stated in a 1975 lecture, "open to many challenges, to many doubts, to many challenges." And because the World economic system is Atlantic centered, American protected and New York financed it is the Trilateral Commission's view that these powers must mitigate the economic competition among themselves or else risk losing their position of international economic supremacy. As policymakers and influencers, Trilateralists are attempting to prevent this.

Today the Capitalist nations are threatened by the emergence of Third World nations, especially in Africa, who are beginning to assume control of the natural wealth which blesses their domains. The Western and Japanese economies are completely dependent on these minerally rich nations. Corporate profits depend on the bauxite, iron ore, uranium, copper and cheap labor force which these countries provide.

But it is not just their predicament. It settles just as comfortably in both my lap and yours. Our standard of living is dependent upon this exploitation, and it is only a matter of time before we will be unable to live as affluently as we do in face of the poverty of these developing nations. Africa is exploding. It's time that we as a people face the reality of a redistribution of international economic wealth.

The Trilateral Commission feels otherwise. What do you think?

We can't afford it

By JAMES POSGAY

Next Thursday, the Joint Ways and Means Committee will review the budgets of UMass, SMU and Lowell University. All of these institutions have received level funding. Why?

Why does the governor want to level fund 43,000 university students?

Some have told me that the state cannot afford quality education for its citizens.

Some have told me that the governor wants to put the squeeze on the UMass administration so they will clean up thier act.

Some have told me that the corporate interests of this world want to oppress academia and use it for their best interests.

Whatever the reason, the students at UMass, SMU, and Lowell University are going to get ripped off.

And the interesting thing is, nobody cares. The students at UMass, Amherst pay 44 per cent of the total university budget through tuition, fees, rent and boarding costs, yet the students exercise .01 per cent of their power in these matters.

The faculty need a raise because their buying power has been reduced 24 per cent since 1974, so the faculty decided to form a union to deal with this problem and collectively fight this injustice.

And the trustees choose to ignore them so the faculty choose to sit around baffled by it all.

I'd ignore them too; one should ignore a nest of mice.

The Student Organizing Project has attempted to organize a Student Union on this campus over the past couple of years. Every time we make headway, some CIA related group shows up under the name of an innocent student group that's into "building the movement."

What fascinates me is how the upper echelon of such organizations as the Revolutionary Student Brigade and the Progressive Labor Party can fly around the country stiring up trouble on button and bumper-sticker money.

UMass (to quote Bob Wood, "the flagship of the State") is funded at $3,095 per student. The Boston campus is funded at $2,400 per student and they're mad at us. SMU is funded at $2,035 per student and they decided to file suit charging the state with institutional discrimination. Lowell University is funded at $2,200 per student and the faculty are thinking of a strike because of the working conditions.

Senate President Kevin B. Harrington has given up trying to reorganize higher education because no one will give him a job in the state education system and his brother, the president of Massachusetts Maritime Academy, is guilty of some of the worst budgetary abuse of all the state colleges.

Bob Wood wants to put the control of higher education into the hands of a few corporate trustees. The governor wants to give the control to his Greek friends.

The bottom line is still the same; the ship is going down.

This whole thing reminds me of my derelict vision of 1975.

Here we are inside this building talking about the philosophy of free will.

Student A: "If I drop this check cashing service, it is because I will it to be dropped."

Student B: "No you don't, Dean Field says that it will be dropped and you just go along. You don't have free will because you can't stop it."

Someone comes in the room, a non-philosopher, and says, "excuse me, ahh, the building is burning down. I suggest we do something about it."

Student A: "Thats interesting. Could you go out and find out what the fire will do and come back and tell us about it?"

"But the building is burning down!"

Student B: "We can't be bothered with this kind of thing. Our job is to find out if we have free will."

So this person goes out and calls the governor's fire department to have the fire put out.

The Governor says: "We can't afford to put it out".

—And the student comes back and Student B gives him a dime and sends the student off to the Hatch to buy a cup of water. Problem solved?

Instead of all this ridiculousness, why don't we all go outside and put the fire out and come back later and decide if Dean Field has free will?

NEWS IN BRIEF

Rep. seeks tougher porno laws

BOSTON [UPI] — A legislator upset with the Massachusetts Supreme Court's dismissal of obscenity charges against a Boston bookstore said yesterday he would try to strengthen state laws regulating pornography.

Rep. Raymond L. Flynn, D-South Boston, said he will seek a meeting with state Attorney General Francis X. Bellotti and legislative leaders to prepare "further clarifying legislative language to make our state's pornography laws functional and decisive."

Lawmen urge auto rate freeze

BOSTON [UPI] — Two state lawmakers said yesterday they will file a bill to freeze auto insurance rates temporarily at 1976 levels, repeal competitive rating and order Insurance Commissioner James Stone to set rates based on new data favorable to consumers.

Sen. Alan D. Sisitsky, D-Springfield, said Stone should consider the greatly improved profit-loss picture companies experienced in 1976 when he sets new rates. He said 1977 rates were based largely on unfavorable 1975 data.

Meany aids beer labor strike

WASHINGTON [UPI] — AFL-CIO President George Meany declared yesterday a nationwide labor boycott against Coors beer, a Colorado-made beverage that has attracted a cultish following over the past decade.

Meany, 82, who seldom drinks beer, said the boycott will continue until the Adolph Coors Co. signs a new labor agreement with Brewery Workers Local 366 in Golden, Colo.

Some 1,500 brewery workers have been on strike against Coors since April 5, and the company announced earlier this week that it was about to hire replacements for the striking workers. Their previous contract expired last Dec. 31.

Soviets warn own ships of limits

MOSCOW [UPI] — The Soviet Union, reacting cautiously to the seizure of two Russian ships in U.S. waters, Thursday ordered its fishing fleet captains to give "strict observance" to new U.S. 200-mile coastal fishing limits.

The directive to Soviet fishermen, published in the official government newspaper Izvestia, was the Kremlin's first indication of a problem with the United States over operations of the Soviet fishing fleet, the world's largest.

Creditors must publicize info

BOSTON [UPI] — The nation's largest consumer credit reporting agency has agreed to make all information it holds on Massachusetts citizens available to them, Attorney General Francis Bellotti said Thursday.

Bellotti said in a news release his office negotiated with Equifax Services after receiving complaints from citizens saying they were denied access to certain personal information about themselves.

Boatmen refuse to unload fish

BOSTON [UPI] — Longshoremen yesterday walked off the job of unloading tons of prohibited fish from a Soviet factory ship in custody for alleged fisheries violations.

A dispute over the unloading of a second Soviet ship apparently caused the walkout.

The Coast Guard had hired 60 members of the International Longshoremen's Association to help unload cod, ocean perch and river herring from the 503-foot Antanas Snechkus, escorted to Boston on Monday for suspected violations of the 200-mile fishing limit law.

Union activists sentenced

SPRINGFIELD, Mass. [UPI] — Two union activists were sentenced to prison terms Thursday on federal convictions of possession and transfer of explosive devices during a 1975 strike.

But U.S. District Court Judge Frank H. Freedman stayed the 18-month sentence of Alex R. Markley, 33, of Holyoke, and the one-year sentence of Antonio Suares, 28, pending appeals.

Markley was convicted of five counts and Suares of six charges by a federal jury March 16.

Mass., Maine will sue N.H. to recover illegal taxes

CONCORD, N.H. (AP) — Two of New Hampshire's neighbors resumed their fight yesterday to get back money their citizens paid into New Hampshire's illegal commuter income tax. New Hampshire vowed to fight the action vigorously.

The attorneys general from Massachusetts and Maine filed a suit in Merrimack County Superior Court seeking the return of $13.6 million which New Hampshire collected from 1970 to when the commuter tax was declared unconstitutional two years ago. Massachusetts is asking for $10 million and Maine $3.6 million.

Maine Atty. Gen. Joseph Brennan said he was seeking justice for Maine residents, calling the New Hampshire tax a "tax scheme."

"I do not see why Massachusetts residents should be forced to support the state of New Hampshire when New Hampshire does not even tax the income of its own residents," Massachusetts Atty. Gen. Francis X. Bellotti said.

The U.S. Supreme Court in 1975 declared the tax illegal, but did not require New Hampshire to return any of the money collected from Massachusetts, Maine and Vermont citizens who were working in New Hampshire.

Last year the U.S. Supreme Court said the states could not collect the money as government entities because, the court said, the states voluntarily gave tax credits to those citizens who had to pay the New Hampshire tax.

"No state can be heard to complain about damage inflicted by its own hand," the court said.

With the latest legal action, the states are trying a new strategy by filing suit on behalf of their citizens — 4,500 persons in Massachusetts and 10,000 in Maine. A new Massachusetts law allows the state and the citizens to share the money equally.

Vermont officials said for the time being they do not plan to join in the suit. Vermont citizens paid about $3 million to New Hampshire under the tax.

"We and the Tax Department decided to wait and see how Massachusetts and Maine fare ... Frankly we don't think their efforts will be successful," said Deputy Atty. Gen. Greg McKenzie.

New Hampshire Deputy Atty. Gen. Thomas Rath said the state had been aware that Maine and Massachusetts were considering renewed court action and that the state "intends to contest the suit as vigorously as possible on every and all grounds."

An order to pay back the money could cause havoc with the state's precarious financial picture.

HERE'S ONE ENGINEERING OPPORTUNITY YOU WON'T GET IN PRIVATE INDUSTRY.

If you're thinking about a career in engineering, think about this.

How many companies can offer you a nuclear submarine to operate? The answer is none. Equipment like this is available only in one place... the Navy.

The Navy operates over half the nuclear reactors in America. So our training is the broadest and most comprehensive. We start by giving you a year of advanced engineering technology. In graduate school, this would cost you thousands, but in the Navy, we pay you.

Once you're commissioned as a Nuclear Propulsion Officer, you'll earn a top salary. Over $24,000 a year after four years. And you'll be responsible for the most advanced equipment developed by man. All the Navy asks in return is that you serve for 3 years on active duty upon completion of your training.

You have only until May 15th to enroll in this year's Navy Nuclear Propulsion Candidate Program. If you are majoring in engineering, math or physical sciences, contact your placement office to find out when a Navy recruiter will be on campus. Or call toll free, 800-841-8000 (in Georgia, 800-342-5855) for more information. And if you're still a junior, ask about the Navy's NUPOC Collegiate Program, which pays you up to $6,000 during your senior year.

The Navy. When it comes to nuclear training, no one can give you the same opportunities.

NAVY OFFICER.
IT'S NOT JUST A JOB, IT'S AN ADVENTURE.

Minnesota Orchestra appearing at FAC

The Minnesota Orchestra (founded in 1903 as the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra) will make its first appearance in Amherst at the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall Tuesday at 8 p.m. as the third concert in the University's Arts Council Orchestra Series for the 1976-77 season.

Known as the "Orchestra on Wheels", the Minnesota Orchestra has been heard in nearly every state in the Union and throughout Canada.

Tickets for the concert are now on sale at the Fine Arts Center Box Office and at all Ticketron outlets and are priced at $5, $6 and $7 for the general public; one-half price for UMass-Amherst students; $1 off the regular price for other students and senior citizens. The Fine Arts Center Box Office is open from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. Monday thru Friday, 545-2511.

American Family life colloquium at Amherst

"Family Life in America" is the topic of a colloquium now being held at Amherst College. The series began Wednesday, continues through the weekend to next Wednesday and includes many workshops and speakers. For further information call Lorna Peterson, 542-2576 or 549-5513.

'The Fountainhead' showing April 22

"The Fountainhead", the powerful story of a man of independent and uncompromising integrity who stands alone against the world, will be shown Friday, April 22 at 7 and 9:30 p.m. in Thompson 104. Ayn Rand wrote the screenplay for the movie in 1949.

Home economics symposium Monday

A Symposium entitled "Clothing: Quality vs. Price" will be held on Monday from 9 a.m. to 3 p.m., in the Campus Center. The Symposium deals with getting the best product for the best price now when money is tight.

There will be three speakers: Dr. Stephen J. Kennedy, a pioneer in clothing research for the U.S. Army; Ronald J. Dacheco, manager of the Textile and Apparel Testing Center for J.C. Penny Co., Inc.; and Dr. M. Vivian White who is instrumental to the development of Care Labeling.

Portrait sittings ending next week

Next week will be your last chance to be included in the 1977 INDEX. Appointment times are limited and filling up fast! Reserve a time now by calling 545-2874 or come to the 9th floor lobby of the Campus Center between 9 a.m. and 5 p.m.

Your Birthday

by Stella Wilder

Friday, April 15 — Born today, you possess great originality, both of intellect and of spirit. You have depths of enthusiasm you haven't even tapped yet -- and depths of curiosity that promise to carry you into many experiences of a different and even exotic nature. You have no desire to walk in another's footsteps. Even though you may opt to follow another's line of work, you will want to go farther than your model or, if not farther, at least as far in a different way. You are always ready to try new methods for attaining old goals. You have no great loyalty to times gone by; you believe in the future and you have faith in your own ability to have a hand in creating it.

You do not always succeed, but when you fail you do not accept failure stoically, nor do you pretend that failure has not occurred. You are one of those very realistic individuals who is able to take both the bad and the good and mold it into something bigger, better and more influential than either was before. When you fail, you are quick to begin again; when you succeed, you are quick to move on. You do not believe there is anything to be gained by staying behind to savor success any more than there is by wallowing in failure.

A personal relationship of however long a duration is more important to you than anything else in your life. The newest friend stands as great a chance of getting your attention as the oldest. You are a reasonable person, who puts logic ahead of emotion. At the same time, however, you cannot face even the smallest problem unemotionally.

Saturday, April 16

ARIES (March 21-April 19) — Take the traditional approach to difficulties with members of the opposite sex. A woman should wait for the man to call -- and vice versa.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) — Early morning "downs" are matched by late-in-the-day "ups." Be prepared to take another's problems seriously.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) — The recent unproductive period is due to peter out. Make an effort to turn your attention toward new goals. Resurrect ambition.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) — Consider the consequences before jumping into new projects. You may not be able to work satisfactorily with those in authority.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) — Small matters are such that your independence may be threatened. Disregard another's hints about taking over.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) — You might be wise to take another up on an offer of help. This is not a good time to try to prove how far you can proceed on your own.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) — Follow the lead of those who seem to know how the wind is blowing. Don't attempt to strike out on your own at this particular time.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) — Weigh every possible consequence of an action taken against an enemy. You might be better off turning the other cheek -- again.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) — You have a knack for comprehending abstractions. Employ it at this time and you will gain a new understanding of your present position.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) — You should have no trouble being accepted in the society of people you choose. Small gains in evening bring great joy.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) — If you refuse to treat a minor breach of etiquette as though it were a major crime you will do yourself and others a favor. Be calm in evening.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) — You will forfeit success if you fail to complete each phase of a project well. You may need further study in certain aspects of the work.

Ruggers back in action; face Wesleyan, Vermont

By RICHARD MOORE
Collegian Staff

The UMass rugby football club (A and D sides) face Wesleyan at 1:30 Sunday on the rugby pitch west of the Boyden intramural fields; while the B and C sides travel to Burlington, Vermont for a 1:30 contest Saturday against the University of Vermont.

The A side match is a preliminary elimination round for the New England Rugby Football Union Tournament, which will take place here May 14 and 15.

Wesleyan is 1-1. It beat Trinity, 28-0, but lost to Tufts, 12-10.

"We should win that A game and we have to win it," UMass coach 'Doc' Laurence said.

"There's a lot of pride involved, we're hosting the New England tournament and it would be a hell of a thing to get knocked out of the championship round now," Laurence added.

Laurences' main concern is with the offensive play of his backs. Three sides managed only one score against the Portland, Maine club last weekend.

"The ball handling has just been inadequate, "Laurence said. "We are not getting the ball out to our wings fast enough.

"We're a running team and we have the backfield talent to control the ball," Laurence added, "but our backs have to move the ball quickly and play together."

Laurence said Billy Foye, New England all-star center for the Beacon Hill club, was expected to work with the MInutemen backs this week in practice.

"Billy is one of the best centers in the United States," Laurence said, "and I'm sure our backs will benefit greatly from his guidance."

"I expect a lot more offense than what we showed against Portland," he added.

The UMass A side has not lost to the college side since Amherst College beat it 10-7 last spring.

At Burlington the UMass B side will play Vermont's A side and the C side will square off against the Catamount's B's. The Minutemen B's lost, 10-7, to Vermont's A side in the fall.

"Our B side should win, "Laurence said. "Vermont is physically much larger than us, but I think our speed will be too much for them."

"Our C side is made up largely of inexperienced rugby players, "Laurence added, "but there are a lot of good athletes on the C's and they are looking better as they play more."

Cooney second

Doug Cooney, UMass graduate student, placed second in national weightlifting competition held earlier this month in Michigan.

Competing in the 220 lb. weight class, Cooney set three New England while placing second among all competition.

Cooney is also the reigning New England champion in his weight classification, and is priming for the 1980 Summer Olympics.

Naiads synchronize fine aquatic show

By LAURA BASSETT
Collegian Staff

REVIEW

Despite oppressive heat and humidity and minor technical difficulties, the opening performance of the Naiads annual Aquatic Arts presentation was as good as I expected it to be.

The program consisted of 11 small routines and a finale, each portraying a specific message using aquatic art skills. The first part of the show consisted of several larger group numbers of six to 10 swimmers. Naturally the larger the group the greater the problems of synchronization but the long hours of practice were evident in the routines.

"Water Folly," a whimsical spoof on traditional water ballet, was well-coordinated and enjoyable. "Unity," another large group number, had good thematic quality and good execution of stunts. "Friendship" closed out the first set of routines and was one of the strongest performances in the show. Choreographed and performed by Naiads officers Anne Fallon and Laurie Jo Green, "Friendship" was a very complete composition combining really good use of aquatic skills and feeling to communicate the message of how close friendship exists in people's lives.

After intermission the Naiads came back with a more traditional number from Tchaikowsky's "Swan Lake" entitled the "Ugly Duckling". This number used especially effective costuming and was well-choreographed. The synchronization of the nine swimmers and solo Laurie Jo Green was also very well executed.

Two other small members were worth mentioning in the second set. A duet by officers Peggy Kinner and Dawn Warner and solo performance by Kathy Loftus were very symbolic and well performed.

Just as it is meant to be, the finale was the crowning point of the entire show. The overall theme of the finale was "It's a Small World" and consisted of several smaller group presentations under this theme. All 36 members of the Naiads joined together in a huge formation to open the finale and moved as a connected group down the length of the pool.

It was a very impressive beginning and led to a series of routines based on music from several representative countries. The show was ended by several well executed large formations which exhibited just how well the group works together.

Being opening night of a performance series after a long session of practice there were some expected flaws in the show but I think the Naiads can be proud of their efforts. The program contained a variety of ideas and themes and all the routines were creative and enthusiastically performed. The show will run two more nights until Saturday and tickets are still available. Be prepared for a warm evening, but definitely don't miss it!

by Niel Rockowitz in the first singles match, 7-5, 3-6, 7-6 (5-3 tie breaker). The match was plagued by several questionable calls which led to a few heated arguments. Rosen, who admitted he was not at his best, let loose some uncharacteristically wild shots, while Rockowitz played a steady game.

Minutemen Jimmy Barnhart and Alan Staple simply outclassed their opponents and won easily. Barnhart, playing fifth singles, defeated Stan Drobal 6-1, 6-1. Staple posted a 6-1, 6-4 win over Frank Fuller.

In doubles, the Minutemen didn't lose a set to previously undefeated MIT. Scores were: Rosen-Green over Rockowitz-Moss, 6-3, 6-2; Kalan-Staple over Drobal Neil Soiffer, 6-2, 7-6 (5-2); Barnhart-Steve Heyl over Sheftall-Yusuf Maniya, 6-1, 6-1.

The win boosted UMass' record to 2-1.

Crewmen face fast Trinity

By BILL CARRINGTON
Collegian Staff

The UMass men's crew will be in Hartford tomorrow to race Trinity College on its home course.

UMass is expected to have its hands full, as Trinity was last year's number two crew in Division II competition, in addition to having a very fast freshman team. Rumors indicate that many of last year's freshmen at Trinity have returned this year to row varsity.

UMass varsity coach Kurt Betchick anticipates a tough race on Saturday. "I have never seen a slow crew from Trinity," he said. "They are a fast, high stroking crew."

Last year, UMass lost to Trinity by less than two seconds. Previous races have been equally as close. UMass has scheduled Trinity in the regular season traditionally, as the location of both schools makes it convenient.

Racing for UMass will be a varsity eight, junior varsity eight, freshman "A" eight, and a freshman "B" eight. The freshman "B" boat and the JV eight will be looking for their first win of the season. The JV's are looking to avoid the errors that cost them the race last week against Marist.

The freshman "B" boat will get its first fair race this Saturday as it will race against Trinity's freshman "B" boat. Last week against Marist, it was forced to race in a three-boat race with the Marist "A" and UMass "A" boat.

Trinity will be coming into this race off an embarrassing loss to Coast Guard Academy, the number one Division II school. Coast Guard demolished Trinity by more than 20 seconds. UMass is coming off a victory over Marist College.

★Batters bow again

"Tommy pitched a super ball game for us," said Bergquist, "its gotta be a tough loss to swallow. I knew when we began the season that we weren't gonna be a great offensive ballclub, but I did expect a little more offense than we've been getting."

"I told my team that on a day like today (by the latter innings the wind had picked up and the temperature dropped) it's gonna be a game of breaks," said Springfield coach Archie Allen. "It just so happened that we got the break."

Saturday the Minutemen head to Durham, NH for a doubleheader against the Wildcats. The prospective starters for the twinbill are Jeff Reardon and Doug Welenc. They're hoping that by Saturday the coughing UMass bats awaken before the teams offensive woes each epidemic proportions.

Gorillas take on Rutgers...

By BEN CASWELL
Collegian Staff

The seventh ranked major college lacrosse team in the nation, Rutgers University, will face-off against the UMass lacrosse team tomorrow at 2:00 p.m. behind Boyden, and do not let the kegs, blankets, and partyers deceive you. For UMass it won't be any picnic.

The Scarlet Knights of New Jersey have played and beaten some of the best teams in the nation so far this season in compiling their 4-2 record.

Early in the season Rutgers defeated the U.S. Naval Academy, the sixth ranked team in the nation, by a score of 9-7. Since then the Scarlet Knights have defeated C.W. Post, 14-6, the U.S. Military Academy 13-8, and Buckness College, 14-6.

In their two losses, the Scarlet Knights played admirably in defeat, losing by one goal to the University of Pennsylvania the fourth ranked team in the nation by a score of 13-12. Against the number one team in the nation, Cornell University, the Scarlet Knights were behind the Big Red 7-4 at halftime before losing, 15-10, at Ithaca, the Big Red's home field.

Rutgers has a similar type of 'run and gun' attack that Garber's Gorillas employ. Big midfielders and attackmen who can move the ball around should provide a tough afternoon for the UMass defense.

At midfield the Scarlet Knights are led by Joe Reilly (26) and Jim Teatom (28) who are the team's best offensive middies. The team's leading goal scorer is attackman Tom Sweeney (13). Sweeney teams up with the Scarlet Knights' leading assist man, Bob Olsen (7) who also leads the team in total points, and Jim Ford (11). Olsen had four goals and three assists against Cornell University.

On defense Chuck Apel (14), Rex Capro (33) and Dick Prakopcyk (34) will play an aggressive type of 'reaching in over the head' defense. Senior goaltender Dick Scipione (1) plays a fair game in the net but is not too strong on clearing the ball which could be a plus for UMass' riding attackmen.

After playing Rutgers tomorrow Garber's Gorillas will have a brief respite, one day to be exact, before they tangle again, this time with the likes of the Eagles of Boston College. The Eagles have a much improved squad from last year and have shown that improvement in a close loss to Brown University, a perennial New England power. Alsot the Eagles have bombed other lesser quality New England opponents. That game will start at 2:00 p.m. on Monday.

But before attempting to eat an Eagle, the Gorillas will have their work cut out for them in trying to knock a Scarlet Knight off its high horse. UMass' playoff hopes for this season will depend heavily on tomorrow's outcome.

...while women open up season

By JIM GLEASON
Collegian Staff

The UMass women's lacrosse team opens its second year with a tough game as it plays Northeastern tomorrow at 1:00 on the field next to NOPE.

Although this is the women's first game, they've been practicing for six weeks and will be ready. Last year, Northeastern provided the opposition for the first game which UMass won, 9-6.

Coach Frank Garahan, in his second year at the helm cites Northeastern as a perennial power. "They're a well-established team and we're going to have to put it all together to beat them."

Even though this is only UMass' second season, it too must be considered a power. Newly elected co-captains Nancy O'Neil and Debbie Ames lead a team which is comprised of many returning players plus some surprising new talent.

"The team looks a lot better than it did last year at this time. The quality of stick-handling has improved and we're better balanced at the positions," Garahan said.

This, in fact, creates a rare problem for Garahan. "We've got so many good players that it's tough deciding who will start at some positions. But it's good to know I can use my bench any time with confidence."

Garahan stated that the team's offense starts with a fastbreak but "if it isn't there, we'll go into a more sophisticated ball control offense."

A fast break offense is successful if, after a save, the goalie can clear the ball quickly. It also depends on the good conditioning of the players. That is something which has yet to be tested. Northeastern should provide a more than adequate challenge tomorrow.

Chimps shatter baby Bulldogs

By RUSS SMITH
Collegian Staff

Two goals performances by Anthony Florence, Steve Colella, Brad Mitchel, and Carl Leone triggered coach Pete Connelly's UMass lacrossemen to a 9-1 rout over Yale's mini-Bulldogs (Pups?), in the Chimp's season opener.

The game was only four minutes old when after moving the ball around, Mitchel set Davis up for a nice scoring attempt. Davis' backhander, however, didn't reach the netting as Yale goalie Craig Hornis came up with the save.

Yale went on the attack, and got on the board first (and ironically for the last time) when Yale-man Andy Putnam got a 'garbage goal' (that's exactly what players on the visiting team's bench called it), scooping the ball up off the ground in a scramble, and flipping it into the left hand top corner. Yale-1 UMass-0.

But fear not. Before Yale could pronounce the names of the other Ivy League schools (they got as far as Har-vard and Dartmouth), the mini-Minutemen knotted the score at 1-apiece.

Colella hauled in a pass from teammate Mark Schwarz, spun around a Yale player who was doing a poor imitation of a defenseman, and bounced a 15-footer into the strings, putting UMass on the board.

The two players reversed roles on the next play, Colella passing off to Schwarz, whose backhanded shot was turned into a save by Yale's Horhis.

With three minutes left in the first quarter, Leone got what turned out to be the game winner, rifling a shot from 20 feet, giving UMass a 2-1 lead. And when Florence dumped in an over-the-shoulder backhander in period number two, UMass' halftime lead stood at 3-1 (which was plenty).

Forty seconds into the third quarter, Jeff Davis scored while standing at Yale's crease, putting the chimps up by three.

There was no doubt now as to the eventual game-winner. UMass would pump in five more goals in the second half before it was over. Yale players did have something to look forward to; the bus ride back to New Haven would be a quiet one. There's no place like home!

Softballers top URI for third straight win

By PAT MCGRATH
Collegian Staff

The UMass women's softball team extended its winning streak to three consecutive games as it held on to defeat U.R.I. by a score of 4-3 on Thursday in Kingston.

The game was characterized by a fine pitching performance from freshman Sue Peters and a somewhat sloppy defense, as the Minutewomen committed seven errors.

The UMass offense could only muster six hits throughout the game, as once again the softballers had trouble stirring up a consistent offense. The only big hit of the game came when senior Heidi Dickson belted a double which scored two important runs in the fourth inning. Sue Peters has laced a triple and Cheryl Meliones had walked to score on Dickson's two-bagger. The only two other UMass runs were unearned.

"It wasn't a good game for us," commented coach Dianne Thompson. "The offense wasn't there and our mental lapses on defense really hurt. We were lucky to survive with only three runs scored against us."

Peters was a bright spot for UMass as she picked up her second victory of the season against no losses. She allowed three runs, six hits, one base on balls, and struck out six batters. Peters also continued to wield a hot bat as she had yet another triple.

UMass' problems on defense came mainly through a lack of communication among the infielders. Thompson hopes that her team can improve significantly on that aspect of the game before Saturday's game against Keene State which will be played at home.

"I still have all of my confidence in the team," commented Thompson. "Keene state will be a tough game and we will have to play good team softball in order to beat them. We can do it!"

In that game, Thompson plans to start Gail Matthews on the mound and put Peters in left field, switching Rita Riley to right.

The six hits for the Minutewomen were tagged by Carol Bruce, Rita Riley, Peters (triple), Sue DiRocco (triple), Dickson (double), and Pat Oski. Chris Verdini, the freshman third baseman, turned in the game's finest defensive play in the fourth inning when she snagged a shot down the third base line and made a backhanded tag to catch the runner at third base.

The UMass JV's opened their season by belting out 15 hits to blast the URI JV's by a score of 15-0. Freshman Donna Sasso turned in an excellent pitching performance as she went the route and allowed just three hits and two walks while fanning seven. Many of the JV's had dazzling defensive plays. Pat DeCaire at third, Joanne Davis behind the plate, and Karyl Resnick at first had particularly fine efforts.

"I'm really proud of them," said a pleased JV coach Linda Wetherby. "Everyone did well and everyone played. We have real diversity on this team."

The JVs will also face Keene State on Saturday, April 16th, on the field behind NOPE. If the varsity pulls off another win, they will have equalled last year's output of four wins. Things are looking up for the Diamondwomen.

"If we can get our bats going and play heads-up softball, we should have a good game," summarized Thompston.

Huge field gathers for UM Relays

By DAVE RODMAN
Collegian Staff

All that's left is for the weather gods to smile on the Llewelyn Derby Track tomorrow as the other basic ingredients of a track and field classic: top athletes, excellent facilities, and tenacious competition are already assured in the second annual UMass Relays.

A field of over 1050 athletes will converge on the finest outdoor facility in New England. 748 men, representing about 30 schools and 324 women from 20 schools will compete. This is up from 650 athletes and 32 teams which competed last year.

UMass will field the largest squads in both divisions, with 80 men and 30 women competing. "It's the advantage of being the home team," said coach Ken O'Brien. UConn (64) and Dartmouth (60) will also bring large squads. For the women, it's a case of quality over quantity, as the Age Group Athletic Association of Connecticut is only bringing two competitors, but both are Olympic caliber athletes. The Falmouth Track Club and the Liberty Athletic Club both have small but talented teams.

No scores or team standings will be kept, so it will be a chance for the studs to bang heads, and the second-raters to feel what it's like to run a sub-4:10 pace, or something akin to that.

"We'll be using this meet basically to qualify individuals for the coming championship meets in their respective events," said O'Brien. "We also want them to get experience for the critical championship meets such as the conference meet. We'll also be trying to qualify some of the relays — but qualifying individuals is our main goal."

The first event will take the gun at 10:00 a.m. 29 events, both individual and relays, will be contested.

LOSE 20 POUNDS IN TWO WEEKS
Famous U.S. Women Ski Team Diet

During the non-snow off season the U.S. Women's Alpine Ski Team members go on the "Ski Team" diet to lose 20 pounds in two weeks. That's right — 20 pounds in 14 days! The basis of the diet is chemical food action and was devised by a famous Colorado physician especially for the U.S. Ski Team. Normal energy is maintained (very important!) while reducing. You keep "full" — no starvation — because the diet is designed that way. It's a diet that is easy to follow whether you work, travel or stay at home. (Not the grapefruit diet!).

This is, honestly, a fantastically successful diet. If it weren't, the U.S. Women's Ski Team wouldn't be permitted to use it! Right? So, give yourself the same break the U.S. Ski Team gets. Lose weight the scientific, proven way. Even if you've tried all the other diets, you owe it to yourself to try the U.S. Women's Ski Team Diet. That is, if you really do want to lose 20 pounds in two weeks. Order today. Tear this out as a reminder.

Send only $3.00 ($3.25 for Rush Service) - cash is O.K. - to: Wm. CARTER - Human Ecologist, P.O. Box 4262, Department 16, Hayward, Calif. 94540. Don't order unless you expect to lose 20 pounds in two weeks! Because that's what the Ski Team Diet will do.

Although this is the women's first game, they've been practicing for six weeks and will be ready. Last year, Northeastern provided the opposition for the first game which UMass won, 9-6.

Coach Frank Garahan, in his second year at the helm cites Northeastern as a perennial power. "They're a well-established team and we're going to have to put it all together to beat them."

Even though this is only UMass' second season, it too must be considered a power. Newly elected co-captains Nancy O'Neil and Debbie Ames lead a team which is comprised of many returning players plus some surprising new talent.

"The team looks a lot better than it did last year at this time. The quality of stick-handling has improved and we're better balanced at the positions," Garahan said.

This, in fact, creates a rare problem for Garahan. "We've got so many good players that it's tough deciding who will start at some positions. But it's good to know I can use my bench any time with confidence."

Garahan stated that the team's offense starts with a fastbreak but "if it isn't there, we'll go into a more sophisticated ball control offense."

A fast break offense is successful if, after a save, the goalie can clear the ball quickly. It also depends on the good conditioning of the players. That is something which has yet to be tested. Northeastern should provide a more than adequate challenge tomorrow.

Chimps shatter baby Bulldogs

By RUSS SMITH
Collegian Staff

Two goals performances by Anthony Florence, Steve Colella, Brad Mitchel, and Carl Leone triggered coach Pete Connelly's UMass lacrossemen to a 9-1 rout over Yale's mini-Bulldogs (Pups?), in the Chimp's season opener.

The game was only four minutes old when after moving the ball around, Mitchel set Davis up for a nice scoring attempt. Davis' backhander, however, didn't reach the netting as Yale goalie Craig Hornis came up with the save.

Yale went on the attack, and got on the board first (and ironically for the last time) when Yale-man Andy Putnam got a 'garbage goal' (that's exactly what players on the visiting team's bench called it), scooping the ball up off the ground in a scramble, and flipping it into the left hand top corner. Yale-1 UMass-0.

But fear not. Before Yale could pronounce the names of the other Ivy League schools (they got as far as Har-vard and Dartmouth), the mini-Minutemen knotted the score at 1-apiece.

Colella hauled in a pass from teammate Mark Schwarz, spun around a Yale player who was doing a poor imitation of a defenseman, and bounced a 15-footer into the strings, putting UMass on the board.

The two players reversed roles on the next play, Colella passing off to Schwarz, whose backhanded shot was turned into a save by Yale's Horhis.

With three minutes left in the first quarter, Leone got what turned out to be the game winner, rifling a shot from 20 feet, giving UMass a 2-1 lead. And when Florence dumped in an over-the-shoulder backhander in period number two, UMass' halftime lead stood at 3-1 (which was plenty).

Forty seconds into the third quarter, Jeff Davis scored while standing at Yale's crease, putting the chimps up by three.

There was no doubt now as to the eventual game-winner. UMass would pump in five more goals in the second half before it was over. Yale players did have something to look forward to; the bus ride back to New Haven would be a quiet one. There's no place like home!

Softballers top URI for third straight win

By PAT MCGRATH
Collegian Staff

The UMass women's softball team extended its winning streak to three consecutive games as it held on to defeat U.R.I. by a score of 4-3 on Thursday in Kingston.

The game was characterized by a fine pitching performance from freshman Sue Peters and a somewhat sloppy defense, as the Minutewomen committed seven errors.

The UMass offense could only muster six hits throughout the game, as once again the softballers had trouble stirring up a consistent offense. The only big hit of the game came when senior Heidi Dickson belted a double which scored two important runs in the fourth inning. Sue Peters has laced a triple and Cheryl Meliones had walked to score on Dickson's two-bagger. The only two other UMass runs were unearned.

"It wasn't a good game for us," commented coach Dianne Thompson. "The offense wasn't there and our mental lapses on defense really hurt. We were lucky to survive with only three runs scored against us."

Peters was a bright spot for UMass as she picked up her second victory of the season against no losses. She allowed three runs, six hits, one base on balls, and struck out six batters. Peters also continued to wield a hot bat as she had yet another triple.

UMass' problems on defense came mainly through a lack of communication among the infielders. Thompson hopes that her team can improve significantly on that aspect of the game before Saturday's game against Keene State which will be played at home.

"I still have all of my confidence in the team," commented Thompson. "Keene state will be a tough game and we will have to play good team softball in order to beat them. We can do it!"

In that game, Thompson plans to start Gail Matthews on the mound and put Peters in left field, switching Rita Riley to right.

The six hits for the Minutewomen were tagged by Carol Bruce, Rita Riley, Peters (triple), Sue DiRocco (triple), Dickson (double), and Pat Oski. Chris Verdini, the freshman third baseman, turned in the game's finest defensive play in the fourth inning when she snagged a shot down the third base line and made a backhanded tag to catch the runner at third base.

The UMass JV's opened their season by belting out 15 hits to blast the URI JV's by a score of 15-0. Freshman Donna Sasso turned in an excellent pitching performance as she went the route and allowed just three hits and two walks while fanning seven. Many of the JV's had dazzling defensive plays. Pat DeCaire at third, Joanne Davis behind the plate, and Karyl Resnick at first had particularly fine efforts.

"I'm really proud of them," said a pleased JV coach Linda Wetherby. "Everyone did well and everyone played. We have real diversity on this team."

The JVs will also face Keene State on Saturday, April 16th, on the field behind NOPE. If the varsity pulls off another win, they will have equalled last year's output of four wins. Things are looking up for the Diamondwomen.

"If we can get our bats going and play heads-up softball, we should have a good game," summarized Thompston.

Huge field gathers for UM Relays

By DAVE RODMAN
Collegian Staff

All that's left is for the weather gods to smile on the Llewelyn Derby Track tomorrow as the other basic ingredients of a track and field classic: top athletes, excellent facilities, and tenacious competition are already assured in the second annual UMass Relays.

A field of over 1050 athletes will converge on the finest outdoor facility in New England. 748 men, representing about 30 schools and 324 women from 20 schools will compete. This is up from 650 athletes and 32 teams which competed last year.

UMass will field the largest squads in both divisions, with 80 men and 30 women competing. "It's the advantage of being the home team," said coach Ken O'Brien. UConn (64) and Dartmouth (60) will also bring large squads. For the women, it's a case of quality over quantity, as the Age Group Athletic Association of Connecticut is only bringing two competitors, but both are Olympic caliber athletes. The Falmouth Track Club and the Liberty Athletic Club both have small but talented teams.

No scores or team standings will be kept, so it will be a chance for the studs to bang heads, and the second-raters to feel what it's like to run a sub-4:10 pace, or something akin to that.

"We'll be using this meet basically to qualify individuals for the coming championship meets in their respective events," said O'Brien. "We also want them to get experience for the critical championship meets such as the conference meet. We'll also be trying to qualify some of the relays — but qualifying individuals is our main goal."

The first event will take the gun at 10:00 a.m. 29 events, both individual and relays, will be contested.

Famous U.S. Women Ski Team Diet
During the non-snow off season the U.S. Women's Alpine Ski Team members go on the "Ski Team" diet to lose 20 pounds in two weeks. That's right — 20 pounds in 14 days! The basis of the diet is chemical food action and was devised by a famous Colorado physician especially for the U.S. Ski Team. Normal energy is maintained (very important!) while reducing. You keep "full" — no starvation — because the diet is designed that way. It's a diet that is easy to follow whether you work, travel or stay at home. (Not the grapefruit diet!).
This is, honestly, a fantastically successful diet. If it weren't, the U.S. Women's Ski Team wouldn't be permitted to use it! Right? So, give yourself the same break the U.S. Ski Team gets. Lose weight the scientific, proven way. Even if you've tried all the other diets, you owe it to yourself to try the U.S. Women's Ski Team Diet. That is, if you really do want to lose 20 pounds in two weeks. Order today. Tear this out as a reminder.
Send only $3.00 ($3.25 for Rush Service) - cash is O.K. - to: Wm. CARTER - Human Ecologist, P.O. Box 4262, Department 16, Hayward, Calif. 94540. Don't order unless you expect to lose 20 pounds in two weeks! Because that's what the Ski Team Diet will do.

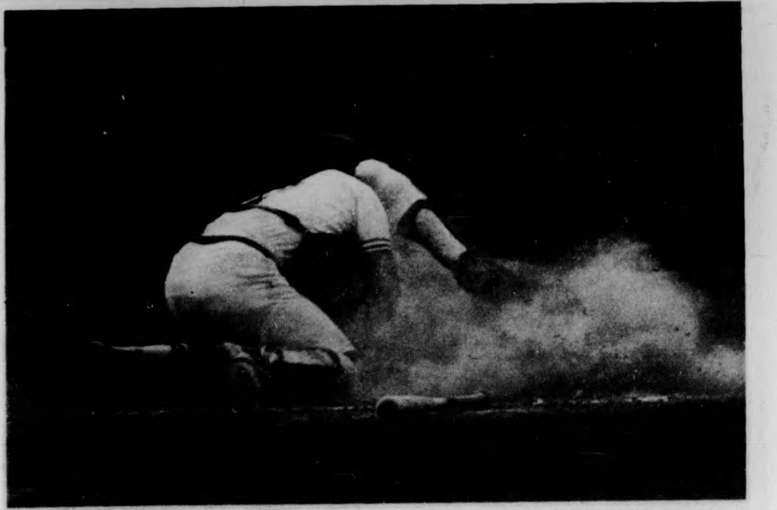
Diamondmen fail in 10th; Chiefs, 2-1



Unfortunately for the Minutemen, they couldn't sniff out home plate enough yesterday as they bowed to Springfield College, 2-1, which dropped their record to 8-11. (Staff photo by Bob Higgins)

By RICH ECKEL
Collegian Staff

SPRINGFIELD — Springfield coach Archie Allen hosted Dick Bergquist and his squad for a summit meeting here yesterday in order to determine which team had the greatest offensive capabilities. After 10 innings the conclusion was easily reached — neither team holds enough offensive firepower to warrant an arms agreement.

But the Chiefs did prove to have just enough ground support to enable an exciting, 2-1, extra-inning victory over the Minutemen. The loss was the fourth straight for UMass (not counting the Holyoke Miller exhibition) and its second straight one-run loss, dropping the team's record to 8-11. Springfield upped its early season mark to 2-1.

The teams entered the tenth inning tied, 1-1, and with the wind picking up and blowing directly into the hitters face it appeared the game would continue until sunset.

The Minutemen were set down in order in the top of the inning by relief pitcher Bob Cox, who had entered the game in the ninth, replacing a tired Tom Doherty. And in the bottom half UMass pitcher Tim Nigro seemed to have control of the situation as he set the first two batters down in order. However, Springfield catcher Brian Cox, who Nigro had K'd three times earlier, connected on an 0-1 delivery and doubled to left. First baseman Marty Gomez then blooped a single to short centerfield to score Cox on a close play at the plate. The throw from centerfielder Paul Abramowicz was on time, however, Cox barreled into catcher Charlie Ciccone, jarring the ball from the catcher's grasp.

"I threw him (Gomez) a fastball right on the handle," said a dejected Nigro. "It was a cheap hit, but that doesn't matter — they all count." The heartbreak loss lowered Nigro's record to 3-2, who if the lack of offensive punch continues may consider suing his mates for non-support.

The Minutemen could muster just four hits in the ballgame, all off impressive sophomore starter Doherty, who baffled UMass for eight complete innings. The tall righty struck out five, while walking four during his stint.

The Minutemen reached Doherty for their only run in the eighth frame. After fanning both Mike Stockley and John Czerapowicz to lead off the inning, Doherty got himself in trouble by walking Mike McEvilly. Abramowicz then advanced McEvilly to second as he rolled a single between the third and short hole, into leftfield for a single. First baseman Dale Stone followed with a clutch carbon-copy single into left to score McEvilly and end any chance for a Doherty shutout.

Nigro matched Doherty throughout, although he had to pitch himself out of some trouble spots. In the third with two men on, Nigro turned a 1-6-3 double play to wiggle out of the jam. Springfield shortstop Dan Laurenti executed a textbook hit-and-run play with two outs in the fifth to put Chief runners on the corners. Nigro settled down however, and reached back for something extra as he smoked a fastball past number nine hitter Mark Haver to end the inning.

But in the sixth, Springfield touched Nigro for three hits and its other run. Designated hitter Bob Steitz started the frame off by singling to leftfield and stealing second base. Sandwiched in between two called strikeouts was another single by Cox. Scott Miller, the Chiefs centerfielder, brought Steitz to the plate with (what else) a Texas Leaguer into center.

Sox need big trade to rise in '77

The 1977 baseball season is but a week old and already the question of "What's the matter with the Red Sox?" is being heard throughout New England.

Too early for that, you say? Four games don't make a season or there's still plenty of time. If you take that attitude, then you must be an extreme optimist.

The 1977 edition of the Boston Red Sox has its share of problems. Name a few, you ask? Start with thin pitching (No, I'm not refering to the slimmed down Reggie Cleveland) that does not include a lefthander capable of starting or relieving. The shortstop. (Rick Burleson committed a league leading 34 errors last year and has four already this season). And most of all, team unity.

Those three categories are the most important elements of any ball club that intends to be a pennant contender. Without them you might as well say forget it and build for the future.

On paper the starting pitching staff of Luis Tiant, Fergie Jenkins, Rick Wise and Reggie Cleveland looks adequate. The bullpen with Bill Campbell, Jim Willoughby, Tom Murphy and Tom House is supposed to be strong and deep.

I have never seen a more disgusting game than the one I sat through last Sunday at Fenway. What had been a good game for seven innings turned into something I'd expect to see in Toronto or Seattle.

Campbell came in with a chance to redeem himself and left after once again failing to do his job. His colleagues weren't any better either.

So far the fans have been taking it out on Campbell. After all, he's the one with the million dollar contract. Boston fans don't like players making big money and not producing, especially when they are directly affected by it. When Carl Yastrzemski was given a big contract after his super 1967 season, the fans expected him to be as superb every year and really got on him when he wasn't.

When the warm weather comes and Tiant returns, the starting pitching might not be in bad shape. But if the Sox continue to play sloppy defense, it, along with the team is going nowhere.

Burleson had better learn to play shortstop or Dick O'Connell will go out and find someone who can. The Yankees have one on the bench who made only seven errors last year, but they wouldn't give the Sox a chance to land him.

George Scott, who is supposed to be the premier first baseman in the league, has three errors already. At 33, he is past his prime, so it is beyond me why the Red Sox would trade one of their most consistent hitters for him.

Jim Rice, who screamed that left field should be his because Yastrzemski is old, has been anything but a major league outfielder and had better get used to hitting out of the DH spot. An outfield of Yaz, Lynn and Evans has to rank among the best in baseball.

Maybe the Sox need a big trade to shake them up. If the California Angels continue to lose, maybe they will be willing to deal with the Sox.

Maybe O'Connell can offer Rice, Evans, Lee, Aase, Merchant and Murphy for Frank Tanana, Dave Chalk and Bobby Bonds. After all, you have to give up something to get something.

Tanana is the best lefthanded pitcher in baseball and would certainly round out the pitching staff. Chalk is a capable young shortstop who would enable Burleson to move to second base. Bonds would be an ideal lead off hitter in Fenway. He has the potential to hit 30 homers and steal 30 bases.

Even if they don't make a blockbuster trade, you can bet your $2.00 bleacher stub that some charges will be made. Dick O'Connell is not one to sit around and do nothing.

Tennis team topples MIT

By MIKE SMOLENS
Collegian Staff

The Minutemen were out to prove their worth in doubles yesterday against MIT but instead showed their singles expertise as the UMass men's tennis team swept the singles competition to clinch the match. The Minutemen then went on to take all three doubles matches to frounce MIT 9-0, on the Boyden courts.

The Minutemen had a tough time in the singles, despite the convincing 6-0 score. Four of the six matches went three sets, one of them decided by a tie breaker.

"All the three set matches," said UMass coach Bill Brown, "show a lot about guts, determination and the players character."

UMass second singles player Alan Green came from behind to take a three set victory over MIT's Pete Moss. Green lost the first set 6-7 in the tie breaker 5-4. The gallery figured Green to be washed up. Considering Green's two set loss to Moss last spring, the spectators' point of view seemed logical. Even Brown had his doubts.

Green quickly took command of the net in the second set and refused to yield. He hit his vollies with more precision than in the first set. Green's net play was too much for Moss, who dropped the next two sets 6-3, 6-1.

Moss and Green last met on clay courts, and this time they played on asphalt. "It made a big difference," Green said of playing on the hard surface, which is more suited for Green's quick serve and volley game.

Barnaby Kalan, at third singles for UMass, and Rickey Sharton, playing fourth singles, chalked up their first wins yesterday. Kalan outlasted MIT's Reed Sheftall 5-7, 6-4, 6-4. The match between the two players, who were similar in style and ability, was drawnout because they both stressed ball control as opposed to going for all out winners.

"It feels good to win," said Sharton after his 3-6, 6-4, 6-2 win over Marcus Jullian of MIT. However, Sharton said he wasn't pleased with his game because he didn't force the action, but merely waited for Jullian to make mistakes.

UMass' Adam Rosen squeeked

Carter - conserve energy or catastrophe

WASHINGTON [AP] — President Carter asked the nation last night to make sacrifices and support his painful, unpopular programs to conserve energy because "the alternative may be a national catastrophe."

"With the exception of preventing war," Carter said in a television address, "this is the greatest challenge our country will face during our lifetimes. The energy crisis has not yet overwhelmed us, but it will if we do not act quickly."

Carter warned that the nation's oil and gas supplies are running out and that reserves in other parts of the world will not be able to meet the rising demand for more than a few years longer.

Carter spoke from his Oval Office desk, looking directly into television cameras, a slight frown on his face. Former President Harry Truman's "The buck stops here" sign was on the desk in front of him.

Wearing a presidential dark blue suit and a light blue shirt, Carter told reporters beforehand he would rather have worn the sweater he donned for his informal fireside chat earlier this year.

"But I couldn't," he said, apparently referring to the more serious nature of this address.

Carter told the nation his energy proposals "will cause you to put up with inconveniences and to make sacrifaces. Many of these proposals will be unpopular."

However, he stressed, the energy crisis "will get worse every day until we act."

Carter declined to unveil the details of his program. The chief executive plans to do that when he addresses Congress on Wednesday. Instead, he cited specific goals to be achieved and the principles used to formulate his program.

"We must be fair," he said.

"Our solutions must ask equal sacrifices from every region, every class of people, every interest group. Industry will have to do its part to conserve, just as consumers will. The energy producers deserve fair treatment, but we will not let the oil companies profiteer."

To meet the energy challenge, Carter set seven goals to be met by the nation by 1985:

—Reduce the growth rate of U.S. energy demand from its 3.5 per cent or 4 per cent a year to less than 2 per cent.

—Cut gasoline demand 10 per cent below current levels.

—Cut oil imports, currently close to 9 million barrels per day, down to about 6 million barrels a day.

—Establish a strategic petroleum reserve of one billion barrels, enough to keep the nation going through at least a six-month interruption of petroleum supplies.

—Increase coal production by about two-thirds to more than one billion tons a year.

—Insulate 90 per cent of American homes and all new buildings.

Bromery says text problem

By MARY ELLEN LOWNEY
Collegian Staff

Chancellor Randolph W. Bromery spoke out in agreement with faculty at a special Faculty Senate meeting Friday afternoon, attributing the disagreement over Provost Paul L. Puryear's reallocation plan to "minor differences of language and... procedures."

Puryear recently submitted a five-year plan to reallocate university funds "to accommodate new areas of high student demand." At the last meeting on April 7, many senators expressed disapproval of Puryear's methods of introducing the plan.

The Rules Committee called for the special meeting with a motion stating, that the Faculty Senate thinks the Provost's "long range plans are contrary to established governance arrangements." The motion was passed unanimously, with the word "administration's replacing "Provost" on the record.

Bromery agreed saying "we (the administration) support the passage of this motion."

Also, a motion was passed to officially apologize to Puryear for rude behavior towards him at the last Faculty Senate meeting.

On April 7, when Puryear refused to answer a question addressed to him by a senator, the crowd hissed at him. Puryear would not answer the question because the senator didn't specify his name. Puryear said "I have a name and I don't think I'll answer that question until it is used."

The department of Afro-American Studies responded to the behavior at this meeting by calling it "barbaric" and "a disgrace" in a letter appearing in last Thursday's Collegian.

The Rules Committee, in a special report concerning governance, called the Provost's actions in the development of the long range plans "contrary to established governance arrangements," adding "that the campus administration should be invited to respond" to the motion.

Puryear answered the accusations in a five-page memorandum, saying his plan "does adequately point to the general directions in which the resource allocation process should proceed."

"I believe the (Rules) Committee has essentially distorted the meaning of salient campus and Trustee documents," said the memorandum.

The memorandum also stated that tenure decisions must be included in long-range plans. The plan, it said, will "undoubtedly result in some negative tenure recommendations this Spring."

Over 200 people attended the meeting and it lasted less than one hour.

Report becomes debate

By MARY BROWN
Collegian Staff

A report by the provost which began as a proposal to alter the size of many departments in an effort to fit the needs of changing student enrollments, has become a rallying symbol for faculty union supporters seeking to subvert certain functions of the Faculty Senate.

The union is hoping to use the Puryear report to strengthen faculty support for their group through issues such as governance, tenure and planning, normally under the province of the Faculty Senate.

While many of the objections raised about the report have come through the traditional channels of the senate, union representatives have also been hosting their own meetings to hear complaints from faculty.

A series of "emergency meetings" began a week and a half ago with faculties who would be hardest hit under the proposal — the liberal arts departments.

Provost Paul L. Puryear has called for the elimination of 36 faculty positions in the College of Arts and Sciences in the next five years. According to the report, enrollments in liberal arts programs are relatively low causing student-faculty ratios to be low.

A reallocation of resources is necessary, according to the report, due to the high student-faculty ratios in other schools.

Sources within the Massachusetts Society of Professors say union officials feel the group must respond actively to faculty complaints concerning the Puryear proposal if they are to reverse a March decision by the board of trustees not to recognize them.

The trustees acted on the advice of their attorney Arthur P. Menard, said to be a public collective bargaining expert by UMass President Robert C. Wood. Menard advised that the unit was "too complex" to successfully negotiate a contract.

The union has repeatedly decided not to sue the University on unfair labor practice charges since the March decision in the hope they can still force the trustees to reverse their vote.

Lawyers for the union have estimated a suit could take two years to complete although bargaining could begin at any time. Meanwhile, Menard says no bargaining can take place until such a suit could be decided since bargaining would represent recognition of the unit as it now stands.

So any faculty opposition to the Puryear plan that can be channeled through the union could only help their drive for recognition.

If the administration holds out, it could be two more years before faculty receive salary increases that they have already done without for three years.

One factor which seems to be working for the union is the way the provost presented the report, giving department heads three weeks to respond to his proposals.

Perhaps many faculty would have charged him with unilateral policy making under any circumstances, but a Collegian poll of department heads last week showed that at least some attribute short response time to the presence of the faculty union, elected in February.

The provost's interpretation of the University's governance document, which allows for faculty participation in decision making seems to be different from the faculty's view for the formulation of the plan. Many chairpersons said they objected to a proposal being handed down which they were expected to comment on, rather than working to help formulate the first draft of such a proposal.

Puryear drafted his proposal from a report by the Academic Task Force Review.

Faculty union representatives also hope to generate enthusiasm for their group over the issue of faculty tenure. Some department chairpersons alleged the provost has already denied tenure to eligible faculty under the proposals given in his plan.

According to the plan, fewer faculty will be granted tenure in the future in order to make the University "more flexible" in reallocating resources among departments as student demand shifts.

The report predicts that in order to fill its enrollment requirements, UMass will be forced in the near future to recruit older students who might have a different orientation and demands.

DiCara atypical, but still politician

By PAUL R. CLAFFEY

Politics and politicians, it is said, spring eternal. Though the grueling 1976 campaigns seem barely over, activity continues and the practical politician knows now is the time to start running for whatever office in 1978. There is no such thing as starting too early.

Lawrence Salvatore DiCara is a typical as a Boston politician. He exudes a disarming sort of innocence, a most unusual quality for a successful combatant in the poisoned arena of Boston politics. This quirk is complemented by a decided professionalism, small things such as remembering a name and connecting that name with a local luminary. The unceasing energy and concocted memory would take him to 140 cities and towns last year and probably more this year.

"Bradley, you from Walpole? Didn't you go to Boys State? Your dad was a photographer with the Herald Traveler, wasn't he? Yeah, my dad probably worked with him years back," goes a typical DiCara salvo when introduced.

Picks up trash

FAC staff cleans up act

By ARNOLD WARSHAW and CORKY BYRNE
Collegian Staff

Workers from the Fine Arts Center (FAC) took advantage of Friday afternoon's nice weather and did some spring cleaning outside the FAC.

"We decided to get out and pick the garbage up," said Fritz Farrington, FAC carpenter and organizer of the project which he called "Green Up Day."

"It's not very original," said Farrington, "But now that the weather's getting nice, I thought we could get rid of some of the junk."

And junk there was, as Farrington and his small band of cleaners — never numbering more than eight — filled up bags and cans with garbage and dirt from around the building.

Farrington said that he decided to do it because Physical Plant didn't have the time or the personnel to do the cleaning themselves.

Physical Plant did help out in the effort by supplying tools, trash cans, grass seed and a truck in which to haul everything away.

Fred Steinway, FAC director, waded right into the campus pond to do his part in the clean-up, as other FAC personnel raked garbage out on the banks of the pond.

Steinway and the other workers filled up can after can with leaves, beer bottles, milk cartons, dead gold fish and old Collegian's from the pond.

Steinway said he joined in the cleanup "because I look at it every day, and every day I get more and more disgusted."

"We don't like it to be dirty," said David Letters, FAC Director of Publicity and Advertising.

Edmund Ryan, acting superintendent of the Physical Plant said his department is happy to cooperate in this type of cleanup effort since it has done so on a few other occasions.

Amount mistaken in cafeteria report

OHAG President Scott Wieler revealed that $4,643.10 has been spent on the Orchard Hill snack bar, not the $17,000 that had previously been assumed spent. The original figure had come from representative Gary Shuster, who said there had been a misunderstanding. "It was a mistake," Shuster said.

ORCHARD HILL

A manager for the snack bar will be selected on April 24, and the snack bar will open "hopefully in the fall," according to Wieler.

In continuing action with the Orchard Hill Men's Center and the Women's Center, a motion was passed to give each center a single representative to OHAG. The discussion of the issue was heated, with many representatives feeling that additional OHAG representatives were unnecessary. The final vote was close, 10-8.

A representative from the Committee for Liberation of Southern Africa came to OHAG to ask for support and co-sponsorship of a workshop type discussion on the Hill. The meeting was set for Tuesday night April 26 with OHAG co-sponsoring. A petition to endorse the sale of UMass' stocks in Southern Africa will be circulated.

The Orchard Hill film committee was given power to spend $375 at its own discretion for films on the Hill. Bill Coffey, director of the committee, said that approximately six films will be shown, possibly including a cartoon-comedy night during finals.

Applications for Orchard Hill Women's Center coordinator must be in by May 2. Bring them to the Center, in Field dorm.

★Energy package

— Use solar energy in more than 2.5 million houses.

A draft of White House proposals obtained by news media showed that Carter was seriously considering a "standby" gasoline tax reaching as high as 50 cents a gallon, taxes ranging from $412 to $2,500 on gas-guzzling automobiles and price hikes on oil and natural gas in general.

The energy draft also pointed to mandatory standards for building insulation and appliance efficiency, and measures to make power plants and industries that burn oil or gas switch to coal.

"I am sure each of you will find something you don't like about the specifics of our proposal," Carter said.

"It will demand that we make sacrifices and changes in our lives.

"To some degree the sacrifices will be painful — but so is any meaningful sacrifice. It will lead to some higher costs, and to some greater inconveniences for everyone.

"But the sacrifices will be gradual, realistic, and necessary," Carter added. "Above all, they will be fair."

Carter said his administration will check data from oil and natural gas companies "so that we will know their true production, supplies, reserves and profits."

In one of the few specific points of his address, Carter said that "citizens who insist on driving large, unnecessarily powerful cars must expect to pay more for that luxury."

But Carter said a tough energy program is essential because "the oil and natural gas we rely on for 75 per cent of our energy are running out."

He said domestic production has been dropping about 6 per cent a year while oil imports have doubled over the past 5 years.

"It is a problem we will not solve in the next few years, and it is likely to get progressively worse through the rest of this century, Carter warned.

Flying Club buys Cessna

By KEVIN TURCOTTE
Collegian Staff

The UMass Collegiate Flying Club will be buying a new Cessna 150 airplane tomorrow, after their previous plane crashed last Monday at the Turners Falls Airport.

Jeff Phillips, vice president of the Flying Club, said yesterday the club had been considering the new plane before the other crashed but "the fact that 343 (the last three call letters of the plane) crashed just speeded up the process."

The new plane, a '76 model that has been "used very little," will cost the club $11,900.

"Insurance granted us $5000 on the other plane, $300 of which is deductible, so we got $4700 from the insurance company," said Phillips.

"Initiation fees, dues and revenue collected from members flying will pay the additional cost," said Phillips.

According to Phillips, the club had been planning to trade in their previous plane before it crashed.

He said it costs $50 to join the club, $25 of which is refunded when the member leaves. In addition members pay $12.50 per month for dues and a flat rate of $11 per hour for the airplane rental.

Though these prices seem exorbitant, Phillips said "we figure you'll save about $300 through the club if you're going for your private pilot's license."

Due to insurance reasons, only 20 members of the club are allowed to pilot a single plane.

The possibility of the flying club owning more than one plane, although considered by Phillips, is not that good. "We'd need no less than 15 people committed to go in on another plane," he said.

"It'd be nice though; costs would probably go down," he said.

The new Cessna deal is "a pretty sure thing," according to Phillips. The only possible reason the club wouldn't sign the paperwork tomorrow on the new 150 is "if a better thing comes along."

Sylvan plans Spring Fling for May 1

Sylvan's annual Spring weekend will take place the weekend of April 29-May 1. Many events have been planned for the weekend.

At dusk on Friday, there will be an animated cartoon, "Fantastic Planet" and other short features in the Sylvan courtyard. Saturday in the courtyard there will be three bands performing for the area talent show. There will be refreshments and a barbeque.

A representative from the Student Organizing Project distributed a pamphlet concerning Unionization for the Faculty and a pamphlet called the "Student Power Press" published by The Campus Communication Network and The Student Organizing Project. She expressed a need for assistance in distributing pamphlets such as these. Northeast and Sylvan Area are the only areas without a means of distribution.

Last Thursday Sylvan Area leaders voted to make an amendment in the constitution to change elections for area representatives from the Fall to the Spring.

Pessimism prevails says UMass prof

By CINDY YOUNG
Collegian Staff

The prevailing attitude of today's Western society is that of a "new pessimism." According to Christopher J. Hurn, associate professor in the UMass Sociology department, this "new pessimism" signals a "broader loss of faith in the future: a pessimism about the beneficient effects of technology; pessimism that poverty can be abolished and social problems can be solved by human beings."

This feeling of pessimism first came about in the 1960's, a time of immense problems. Simple solutions were not beneficial, and was assumed that nothing could be done to solve such problems.

"What is dangerous about this view," Hurn warns, "is that the current pessimism can lead to despair and to a withdrawal to private concerns. The new pessimism can become a self-fulfilling prophecy."

An article written by Hurn attacking this pessimism will soon be distributed world-wide by the U.S. government in its United States Information Agency magazine, Dialogue, and will also appear in the September issue of Worldview magazine.

Hurn, a graduate of London School of Economics and Northwestern University, is currently teaching courses in Social Change and Sociology of Education, at the University. He has just completed writing his first book entitled "The Limits and Possibilities of Schooling," in which he talks about the difficulty of achieving change within schools. This book deals with change within high schools and junior highs, but Hurn said he feels this general feeling of pessimism is also within the students of the college campus. We have begun to feel "that nothing can be changed unless everything is changed," said Hurn.

GSEU lists TA demands

By ALAN LEVIN
Collegian Staff

Members of the Graduate Student Employees Union met Friday to discuss the possibility of negotiating with the University to resolve their grievances. The Union is upset that many Teaching Assistant jobs are being phased out as a result of UMass budgetary problems.

The GSEU, an organization of University employed graduate students, is currently seeking recognition from the State Labor Relations board.

A list of demands based on projected teaching assistant (TA) positions for next semester was drawn up at the meeting. The Union is asking the University to maintain the current number of TA positions, reappoint all individuals who are now holding TA positions in good standing, and sustain the TA workload guideline of 20 hours per week.

A vote will be held Thursday to determine if the GSEU members support the demands. The four o'clock meeting will be in the Campus Center.

"The University is not bound by law to negotiate," said Chairperson Sherry Flashman. "We are trying to apply a collective action to force them to negotiate."

As a last resort, the Union discussed withholding grades as a type of "job action." This would only be initiated with the help of undergraduate support, Flashman said.

Comparative Literature and Philosophy are examples of departments that expect TA reductions. Comparative Literature is scheduled to be reduced from eight TA's this year to one TA next semester and Philosophy is due to be slashed from 12 to four TA's.

The Department of Environmental Health and Safety recently collected these wedges and assorted paraphernalia (blocks, beer cans, coat hangers) blocking more than 1000 fire doors around campus.

Polymers could safely replace Pill

By DIANNE DRUMMEY
Collegian Staff

Research in plastics may eliminate some of the dangerous side effects of birth control hormones, said a UMass polymer scientist recently.

"A birth control method which would put only the amount of hormone needed, only where needed, would eliminate many of the dangerous side effects," said Wally Deits, a 26-year-old Ph.D. candidate in polymer science.

This safer, more effective method is possible, said Deits, who has combined drugs with polymers - plastics - and tested the rate at which the polymer erodes and releases the drug.

"To control fertility in mammals," he said, it is only necessary to maintain a certain level of hormones in the uterus, not throughout the whole body."

He said current birth control pills distribute massive doses of hormone throughout the body to maintain the appropriate level in the uterus.

"You don't need it anywhere else," Deits said, "and wasted massive doses are what lead to side effects."

An implant on the wall of the uterus would release progesterone at a controlled rate, maintain a relatively low concentration, and avoid high levels all over the body, he said.

A 1974 San Diego State graduate in chemistry, Deits came to UMass because, he said, the polymer science department here is "one of the best in the world." At first polymer drugs were just a side interest, Deits said, but he started reading more and learned it is a very new field with most of the work done within the past five years.

Deits is working with anti-malarial and anti-bacterial drugs. "Just because there aren't a lot of malaria cases in the U.S., most people think it's been wiped out. It hasn't." Deits also said one-fourth of the world population lives in malaria-infested areas, mostly in Asia, and treatment for the disease can take from two to six years. Combining the malaria drug with a polymer would greatly decrease the number of times a patient would have to travel for the drug, and minimize the spread of the disease, he predicted.

Other potential uses for polymers include the combination with an anti-bacterial for the treatment of cuts and burns. With a cut that now requires stitches, Deits said, it would be possible to spray on a polymer and the plastic would hold the wound together and slowly release the anti-bacterial agent at its surface. Burn victims could also be sprayed with a layer of plastic which would keep out infection until the skin grew back, he said.

There are several non-medical products on the market now which use polymers to sustain release, including peststrips, Deits said. "It has ecological advantages when used in fertilizers and insecticides, because so much is washed away now and constant respraying means more goes into the air and ground," he said.

Tix handles campus events

By MICHAEL SIMONS
Collegian Staff

More and more students and Recognized Student Organization (RSO) groups are discovering TIX, the Student Activities Ticket Office located to the left of the Student Senate Note Service window, on the third floor of the Student Union.

Tix has been operating since early March, handling the ticket sales for all Student Activities Trust Fund (SATF) groups which use university facilities.

According to Freshman Larry Gooch, who has been with Tix since its start, "groups that use our tickets feel they can make a bigger profit and in case of a possible sell out, we can sell tickets ahead of time."

When an RSO group uses Tix, its people arrive to begin ticket sales thirty minutes before the event starts. They continue to sell tickets until 20 minutes after the start of movies, thirty minutes after the start of general events, half way through a concert, or any other period of time agreed upon with the sponsor before the time of the event.

A ten per cent service charge is levied on all groups whose functions return a profit, but if they lose money or break even there is no charge. The service charge helps to pay the salaries of the work study students that keep the windows open six days a week.

At the close of an event, Tix transfers the receipts through the RSO system directly into the sponsoring group's account.

"Our movie sales aren't that big yet because people know they can buy tickets at the door," Gooch said.

Gooch said he hopes more people will come to the Tix window to buy their tickets so he will have more to do than just his homework.

★DiCara sometimes a politician, sometimes not was elected to the Boston City Council in 1971 at age 22 — the youngest man ever elected to that August body in an at-large election. He has been a riding star for more than five years and now appears ready to take the first step towards higher political echelons.

But state treasurer? Hardly a position for a man forecasted as mayor of Boston or governor of the Commonwealth.

DiCara is ready for the question. "It doesn't have the excitement of mayor or governor. But in the next 20 years fiscal policy will be the crucial issue and the state treasurer can have an impact on fiscal matters."

Perhaps, DiCara realizes the political manuevering that is going on this very minute. DiCara admits that Joe Timilty probably has a better chance than he to be the next mayor of Boston. But he also doesn't rule out the chance that he could well be the first mayor of Boston with an Italian surname.

"That is a possibility", he says, when asked of his mayoral aspirations. "But I don't want to run for the sake of running. A lot of politicians run more out of habit than commitment. I think Kevin White will run for mayor again — more out of habit than commitment. And I think Joe Timilty will oppose him — again, more out of habit than commitment."

He speaks glowingly of commitment, a kind of hackneyed cliche resurrected in these times of political skepticism. DiCara, though, seems to really believe it: at age 27, politics and government are an all consuming passion, his whirlwind tour of Amherst last week a calculated ploy to drum up support for his future efforts.

The line between politics and government has always been a hazy one, and Larry DiCara is no exception. He was, for example, the first city councillor to propose an ordinance requiring municipal employees to live within the city limits of Boston. That double edged sword clearly cuts both ways, DiCara admits. "A residency ordinance helps both symbolically and economically," he says. "I think that is a good idea."

DiCara the politician and DiCara the city councillor may be in a vulnerable position when the next city council election is held later this year. He will be running for two offices at once: the long battle to be state treasurer barely taking precedence over a confident re-election bid to the city council.

He expects to embark on his quest for treasurer in May. In June, he will announce his candidacy for his third term to the City Council. It will be his last term on the council, or that is what he would have you believe.

"I guess," he says, "if I don't get elected state treasurer I won't run for the council again in 1979," assuming his test in November will result in a fourth term on the council. But DiCara does not wholly discount the possibility of running again in 1981, choosing to take some time off instead of the highest possible calling. He is a self professed "Dorchester Boy" grateful for the opportunity to attend Harvard among blueblood elites; he says those blessed with good minds, a sound upbringing, and a solid education should enter public service. "Unfortunately, life's temptations are great and few of us do."

DiCara sees others like him as the future of the state. If he became state treasurer, he would likely be at odds with the governor, at least in terms of the public higher education budget.

"I think public higher education should be a priority," he says, "it is a good investment for the Commonwealth. Unfortunately, the Governor comes from Brookline, and could afford to go to Harvard. I come from Dorchester, and I was lucky enough to get a scholarship. And there are a lot more Dorchesters than there are Brooklines in this state."

DiCara is uncomfortable on the defensive where politicians find themselves these days. The Watergate syndrome had made even honest politicians suspect, voters choosing to question motives rather than blindly accept principles. That action is something politicians criticize only with great hesitation, even if he believes he is right. DiCara, his record unblemished, lables it "healthy".

His colleagues on the city council are not so innocent as the youthful DiCara. John Kerrigan in recent weeks has scrambled to clean his house — and make his staff show up for work.

DiCara, for better or worse, will not assail his colleague Kerrigan, choosing to use guarded phrases couched with official doublespeak to avoid antagonizing the vindictive chairman. As has been a well known Boston political fact, getting into a "pissing match" with John Kerrigan is not in the best interest of a political future.

So DiCara seems to have a knack for treading the line between mobilizing and offending his potential supporters, an ingredient of a successful campaign. Although he claims more recognition than his probable opponent, Sen. Chester Atkins (D-Harvard) and better qualifications than incumbent Treasurer Robert Q. Crane, voters are not convinced at this early stage: most people outside of Boston don't know who he is, much less believe he will pull the state from its fiscal plight. DiCara knows he has his work cut out for him and it is indeed a very narrow line he must walk.

Where the line will eventually lead in unclear, but up seems the only way for DiCara. He is ambitious, saddled with political fever and inevitably bound to become a statewide figure. His early start has set him in the right direction, and he is attacking his name recognition problem straightaway.

Within five hours at UMass, DiCara appeared for a newspaper interview, a radio interview, three speeches and a 'working dinner'. If nothing else, determination will make him a known, if not a wholly successful, entity.

The kind of energy displayed here last week is commonplace to DiCara and his staff. A trip to a city in western Massachusetts is never for one speech or to find facts about one proposal. Optimal use of time is becoming a characteristic of the "DiCara team".

Larry DiCara, Boston-bred politician afficianado, knows what he wants and is learning how to achieve it. He is a slick yet earthy politician who is mastering the art of "getting known" in a subtle, effective manner. He has honed his basic person-to-person dealings to an incredibly razor-sharp edge.

Whether this strange blend of the old and the new politics will succeed is unclear at this point — but with Larry DiCara we are all bound to find out one way or the other.

Multi-colored canopies in the air attracted the attention of students and car drivers alike, as they watched the UMass Sport Parachute club's campus jump-in Friday afternoon at Hagis Mall.

Jumping from an altitude of 5,000 feet, four skydivers exited from a Cessna 182 jump plane in two passes, landing next to the Whitmore administration building.

Skydivers participating in the jump were Kevin Richardson, president of the Parachute Club; Tom Gilbert, area safety officer; David Strickland; and Pete Kramer filling in for Ken Preble, who was originally scheduled to make the jump.

Gilbert said that he didn't like his ride past the library, complaining of turbulance along the top of the building. Strickland agreed and said that he had a very "squirrelly" ride under canopy.

All the skydivers landed within the designated target area.

Three of the jumpers were using traditional parachutes. These canopies are round or eliptical and have slots that allow air to spill out and make the parachute steerable.

There was one square parachute used, which works on the same principle as a rigid wing does. It is made of five or seven cells that catch air and inflate the canopy. A square parachute has a faster forward speed than a round one.

The demonstration jump was to show people that skydiving is fun, said vice president Al Atlas. "Half the fun is watching the canopy ride," he said.

There will be another jump-in held Thursday, April 21st on campus.

LOS ANGELES: Patricia Hearst, newspaper heiress who joined the Symbionese Liberation Army after she was kidnaped almost three years ago, leaves the courtroom at the Criminal Courts Building. (UPI)

Plea of 'no contest'

Patricia Hearst convicted

LOS ANGELES [UPI] — Patricia Hearst pleaded "no contest" yesterday to charges of assault with a deadly weapon and robbery and the district attorney's office dropped other kidnaping charges, sparing her a second trial.

Superior Court Judge E. Talbot Callister immediately found her guilty on the two counts and set sentencing for May 9.

The 23-year-old newspaper heiress already has been convicted of bank robbery in a federal court in San Francisco and sentenced to seven years in prison. She is free on $1.2 million bail pending appeal in that case.

The "nolo contendere" plea, which amounted to an admission of guilt, came as a surprise at what had been expected to be a routine hearing prior to the start of a second trial May 18 on the Los Angeles charges.

They stemmed from a 1974 incident at a sporting goods stores in which Miss Hearst sprayed the storefront with machine gun fire to permit the escape, of fellow Symbionese Liberation Army members William and Emily Harris.

As a result of her no contest plea, Miss Hearst faces possible penalties ranging from life imprisonment to probation. Under a new California law going into effect in July, however, she could be sentenced to 11 years.

Dressed demurely in a lavender plaid jumper with white blouse and with her golden hair in ringlets, Miss Hearst spoke in a tiny, almost inaudible voice as prosecutor Samuel Mayerson asked if she understood that the state was making no promises suggesting leniency in her sentencing.

Her father, San Francisco Examiner Randolph Hearst, and her mother, Catherine, sat in a spectator section as she, in effect, threw herself on the mercy of the court. They had attended almost every day of her trial last year in San Francisco.

Miss Hearst previously had pleaded not guilty to all counts of the indictment. Mayerson Monday asked her how she now pleaded to counts of assault with a deadly weapon and robbery in the first degree.

"Nolo contendere," Miss Hearst said.

Mayerson informed the court that in return the state was dropping five other counts of assault, two of robbery and two of kidnaping. Miss Hearst and the Harrises commandeered several cars and held two of their owners prisoner after the sporting goods shooting.

Los Angeles District Attorney John Van De Kamp said defense attorney Albert Johnson had informed his office only this morning they wanted to enter the pleas. He said "no deal" had been made. Van De Kamp said the plea would save hundreds of thousands of dollars in holding a lengthy trial.

Johnson refused to say why the decision had been made to enter the "no contest" plea. He said he would not discuss it until after sentencing.

Johnson told Judge Callister the defendant was prepared to have sentence passed immediately but the judge said he first wanted to see a probation report and scheduled the next hearing for May 9.

The Harrises were tried separately on the same 11 counts, were found guilty of five and sentenced to 11 years to life.

Attorney Leonard Weinglass, who defended Emily Harris, told reporters outside the courtroom that he thought the "deal" with Miss Hearst was unfair in view of the fact that she was the only one who fired a shot in the sporting goods store incident.

Gloomy forecast on world oil supply

WASHINGTON [UPI] — World demand for oil may far outstrip supply capabilities by the mid-1980s, driving prices up sharply and ending Saudi Arabia's ability to moderate policies of other oil producing nations, a CIA report said yesterday.

The analysis — far more pessimistic than other studies in recent months — also predicted the Soviet Union will switch from oil exporter to oil importer before 1985, and said China's exports will be "negligible" by the mid-1980s.

President Carter declassified and released the report five hours before his nationally televised talk describing the scope of the world energy crisis and the reasons he feels stringent conservation necessary in the United States.

White House press secretary Jody Powell said Carter agrees with the gloomy forecast of world energy supplies. The President's televised talk was designed to persuade Americans the energy crisis is real and win their support for the potentially unpopular energy policy he will outline Wednesday.

Powell told a briefing the report by the Central Intelligency Agency was influenced by other, similarly pessimistic reports including one issued by the Paris-based Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development. He said those studies had been largely overlooked by reporters.

The CIA analysis, however, took a much dimmer view of world energy supplies than the other studies Powell identified.

Agency analysts said their pessimism was based largely on the project Soviet change from exporter to "substantial importer" in the early 1980s, placing a new drain on Middle East oil supplies, and on the limited supply capabilities of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries.

Control of diabetes, obesity

Sale of saccharin permitted

WASHINGTON [AP] — The Food and Drug Administration, which is banning saccharin as a food additive, announced Thursday it will allow the continued sale of saccharin pills and powders if shown proof they are effective in controlling obesity and diabetes.

Under the approach announced by FDA Commissioner Donald Kennedy, saccharin, which has caused cancer in laboratory animals, would be banned from soft drinks and other foods sometime in July. Such use accounts for 90 per cent of the sugar substitute consumed in the United States.

"Our intention is to eliminate the risk of cancer from unnecessary uses of saccharin while continuing its availability for people who need it for medical purposes," Kennedy told a news conference.

Thursday's action was a follow-up to the FDA's March 9 announcement in which the saccharin ban was first proposed.

The proposed regulation would require that any saccharin sold as an over-the-counter drug carry this lable:

"For use as a noncaloric sweetener when a sugar-restricted diet is medically indicated, as in patients with diabetes. Warning: saccharin causes bladder cancer in animals. Use of saccharin may increase your risk of cancer."

Kennedy said that based on Canadian studies with laboratory rates and what is known about canccer-causing substances, "our scientists now calculate that a moderate use of saccharin, the amount present in one large diet soft drink, if ingested daily over a lifetime by every American, might lead to 1,200 additional cases of bladder cancer per year."

The FDA's proposal will open to public comment for 60 days and will be the subject of two days of public hearings in Washington next month. After that, the agency may amend its 91-page official proposal before issuing a final regulation. That probably will be in July. The FDA then would accept applications from saccharin manufacturers to have their product approved as an over-the-counter drug. The companies would have 180 days to file scientific evidence that saccharin is safe and effective for the uses suggested.

If FDA accepts the application, saccharin would remain available as a drug. Otherwise, the sweetener would be removed from the market entirely.

It will not be easy for manufacturers to show that saccharin is legally a drug and is both safe and effective. But Kennedy insisted his agency is keeping an open mind.

While saccharin is used by diabetics to avoid sugar, which can be harmful to them, and by dieters trying to lose weight, it does not treat either diabetes or obesity.

The proposed ban also would affect cosmetics, including toothpaste, mouthwashes and lipstick, some of which now use saccharin to sweeten their taste.

And the sugar substitute would have to be removed from drugs in which it is used to improve the taste, particularly in drugs intended for oral use by children. The proposed regulation provided some exceptions, such as a drug in which saccharin might be a medical ingredient or in medication intended only for diabetics.

New hearings on nuke plant

NASHUA, N.H. [AP] — A three-member panel of the Atomic Safety and Licensing Board said yesterday it will tightly limit the focus of new hearings on the proposed Seabrook nuclear power plant.

Opponents to the plant told the board at a prehearing that a broad approach should be taken next month when the board reconsiders aspects of the $2 billion plant on New Hampshire's coast.

But the board, siding with the Public Service Company which is trying to build the nuclear plant, disagreed.

A lawyer for the New England Coalition on Nuclear Pollution submitted 24 questions at the prehearing, including 11 questions challenging Public Service statistics on the region's power needs.

All but three of the questions were rejected.

"We're not beginning at day one. We've all had a shot at this before," Board Chairman John M. Frysiak said.

The new hearings beginning May 23 were called by the Nuclear Regulatory Commission which said its licensing panel had not adequately examined the possible use of a closed system tower cooling mechanism, nor possible alternative sites for the Seabrook plant.

Frysiak said the new hearings would be limited to areas directly related to the possible use of cooling towers at Seabrook and the economic and environmental matters concerning alternative sites.

Karen Sheldon, a lawyer for the New England Coalition, said at one point, "I'm somewhat confused as to what aspects we will be able to raise in this hearing."

Mrs. Sheldon indicated that the intervenors would press some of the points during cross-examination of witnesses. But Frysiak insisted, "the need for power issue is not to be retried."

Thomas Dignan, lawyer for Public Service, said the utility opposed broadening the scope of the new hearings. He said the intervenors are only attempting "to overcome what the commission has said in previous decisions."

Public Service has been trying for five years to build the plant at Seabrook on New Hampshire's coast. Neither the Nuclear Regulatory Commission nor the Environmental Protection Agency have given the plant final approval.

Ray's younger brother refutes magazine reports

ATLANTA [UPI] — James Earl Ray's younger brother said yesterday that magazine reports he might have been involved in the assassination of Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. were "a bunch of bull."

Jerry Ray accused the FBI of plotting the civil right's leader's death and said the agency hounded him and his other brother, John, in an effort to get them behind bars also.

Ray, holding a magazine in the air, termed the charges contained in an article about his alleged involvement in the King death "a bunch of bull."

"I know that there was a lot of people involved in it, but I wasn't involved in it in no way," Ray said on a television Phil Donahue show being filmed in Atlanta this week.

Ray, whose brother, James Earl, is serving a 99-year prison term in Tennessee, said he had not talked to his brother for three months prior to the April 4, 1968 slaying in Memphis, Tenn.

He said he is filing libel suits against everyone who has suggested he conspired with his brother, including attorney Percy Foreman.

James Earl Ray fired Foreman as his attorney and accused him of convincing Ray to confess to the King slaying for personal gain. Foreman has said Ray told him Jerry was at a Birmingham, Ala., gun shop with him when he purchased the gun authorities believe was used to kill King.

Jerry Ray said other defendants in the libel suits would be New Times magazine and New Times writer David Lifton, who also appeared on the talk show.

Lifton was co-author of an article which suggested Jerry Ray might have been the mysterious "Raoul" whom James Earl Ray says arranged for him to be in Memphis on the day of the shooting and who gave him money to travel following the assassination.

Ray said he did not know the identity of Raoul, and neither did his brother.

Abortion rights questionable here

SPRINGFIELD, Mass. [AP] — Court action over a 14-year-old girl's desire to have an abortion appeared likely yesterday after an abortion rights activist attacked a hospital for turning the homeless teenager away.

Baystate Medical Center's Wesson Women's Hospital Unit refused to perform an abortion on the girl because she did not have proof of parental consent.

But abortion rights advocate Bill Baird disputed the hospital's contention that the law required parental consent before the girl, who is 22 weeks pregnant, could get an abortion.

"There's a restraining order. The hospital doesn't need the consent of the parents. I accuse them of playing games with the life of this girl," Baird said.

Hospital officials said the status of the controversial Massachusetts abortion law was unclear, but they said would honor a judge's authorization of the operation.

Baird said he would seek an order today at Hampden Superior Court. The advanced stage of the girl's pregnancy made fast action necessary, he said.

Terming the hospital's position a delaying tactic, Baird said a temporary restraining order currently supersedes the state law requiring minors to obtain parental consent or a judge's order.

A suit by Baird challenging the constitutionality of the Massachusetts law is pending at U.S. District Court in Boston.

Solar development for dormitories

(CPS) — At California State University — San Jose (SJSU), dormitory administrator William Schooler simply got fed up with paying high utility rates.

Schooler turned to Dr. Donald Aitken, head of the six-month-old SJSU Center for Solar Energy Application, for help. They came up with a pioneering plan to install solar water heating units in three SJSU residence halls. To save money and provide practical experience to students, they would create a solar workshop.

Under the guidance of Aitken and grad student Jim Altman, who supervises the construction staff of 15 undergraduates, solar energy units have been built and installed on each building. In June, when the program, dubbed "Project Sunshower," is completed 600 students will be using hot water heated without cost by the magnification of the sun's rays, Altman said.

Altman, an environmental studies graduate student, believes the SJSU project is the largest student-built solar water-heating development ever. It is budgeted at a surprisingly low $125,000, as compared to a similar project developed by contractors for a Georgia school system at a cost of $1 million.

It seems SJSU wants to be the trend-setter in practical use of solar power. For instance, university officials have earmarked $600,000 to construct a solar heating and cooling plant for the new $11 million library project at SJSU. Dr. Aitken is working on this building as a technical consultant to the architects.

Project Sunshower itself looks like the prototype for much greater use of solar power in the California State University system. Aitken hopes a successful Sunshower demonstration will encourage the university to use solar methods to heat many of the system's buildings.

University officials, who approved the Sunshower proposal of Schooler and Aitken last summer, have already taken the bait. Beyond agreeing to finance the library's solar energy plant, the officials may extend the current plan to include another three dormitories and a 12-story residence hall at San Jose before expanding the project to other campuses.

The current project is budgeted for $125,000, said Altman, but in 11 years that much will have been saved. By 1997, Schooler said the project "will have paid for itself twice over," in saved utility bills.

According to Schooler, who is quoted in The Christian Science Monitor, the construction won't cost the taxpayers a cent, since reserves collected from student room rents over the years are high enough to cover the budget.

Each dorm houses 200 students. Altman said his team of solar workshop students is building three holding tanks with a total water capacity of 27,000 gallons. They built 360 solar panels totalling 9000 square feet, and are placing them at the top of Washburn, Royce and Hoover dormitories. When they are finished, and professional plumbers and inspectors have adapted the solar heating tubes with the current natural gas system, 70 to 80 percent of the water heating and cooling will be provided for. The remaining percentage will be heated by the original natural gas furnaces, which will be maintained as a backup.

To guarantee the long life of Project Sunshower, Altman said they used "hundred year materials". These are basic raw materials such as wood, glass and steel that should be available for well over one hundred years in case repairs are necessary.

Why NLRB is labor's number one target

[PNS] — Faced with a 20-year trend of declining union representation in American industry, the nation's largest union federation is about to unleash an all-out assault on what it considers the bias and shortcomings of the government's machinery for conducting union elections.

Their target is the National Labor Relations Board (NLRB), the agency responsible for guaranteeing workers the right to organize.

A stark illustration of the frustrations unions have met in efforts to make the Board function in the interests of labor is the case of four workers fired seven years ago for trying to organize a Montgomery Wards store south of San Francisco.

Immediately the Department Store Employees Local 1100 filed a complaint with the NLRB. More than a year later a local judge upheld the complaint. Almost two years after that the NLRB in Washington upheld that decision.

Finally, in 1974 — four-and-a-half years after the workers were fired — the Bojrd ordered reinstatement of their jobs, total back pay of about $50,000 for the four and a replay of the elections the union had lost back in April 1970.

Looking back with some bitterness, Local 1100 secretary-treasurer Dick Williams says, "When I go out to Montgomery Ward and somebody says, "Well, if I sign a card (asking for a union representation election) and I get fired, how long will it take you to put me back to work,' I'd like to have the Board answer that question."

Similar complaints about the NLRB flood AFL-CIO headquarters by the thousands every year. The federation believes they are a major reason its ranks are no longer swelling.

Since 1956, the percentage of America's "organizable workers" in unions (those excluding executives, supervisors, the self-employes and unemployed) has dropped from 42 to 32 per cent.

And in 1974 — for the first time since the NLRB was created in 1935 -- unions lost more NLRB-run elections than they won.

This year the AFL-CIO is giving top priority to new organizing efforts — particularly in the largely non-union South. It has established a coordinating committee to bring the entire federation's muscle to specific union organizing drives.

And as an essential part of its strategy it is preparing a bill to amend the National Labor Relations Act (NLRA) — the law that established the NLRB.

"We think it's absolutely essential," says AFL-CIO Public Relations Director Al Zack. "The changes we propose in the NLRA will make the climate much more amenable to organizing efforts."

The NLRB sets up elections once 30 per cent of the workers at a plant or company have requested one, then requires the employer to bargain with the union if it wins the election. AFL-CIO officials believe it is ineffective, biased and invites employers to defy the law.

Charges of unfair labor practices filed with the Board have doubled in the last 10 years (to nearly 35,000 in 1974), prompting former NLRB chairman Frank W. McCulloch to warn a congressional subcommittee recently of "a widespread, continuing defiance of the law."

Anti-union employers act "on the premise that only timid fools respect the rules because lawbreaking is both profitable and risk-free," charges the AFL-CIO.

The federation believes that employers defeat thousands of organizing attempts every year by firing workers sympathetic to unions and forcing delays of a year or more before elections are held.

Delays have "reached almost scandalous proportions" and "have disillusioned millions of working people," says Rep. Frank Thompson (D., N.J.), who has introduced an NLRB-reform bill in the House.

In addition, charges one AFL-CIO staffer, "There have been one hell of a lot of elections where the unions have never gotten their first contract because of procedural delays and sophisticated gimmickry used by the employer." The federation says this happens once for every five union election victories.

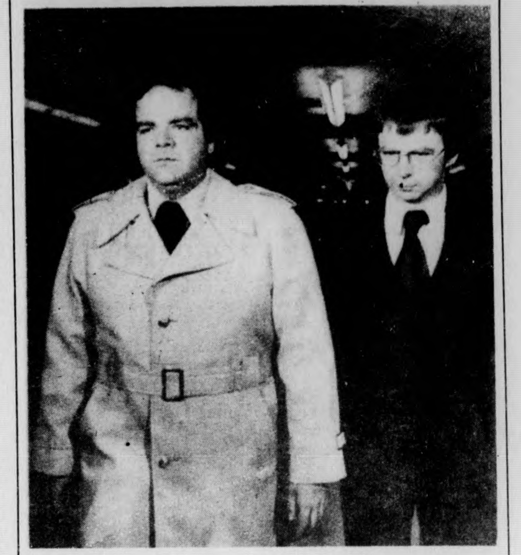
COUNTING ON THE DEMOCRATS

Expecting strong support from the heavily Democratic Congress and probably approval from President Carter, the AFL-CIO plans to link NLRB reform with repeal of the "right-to-work" law, known as 14 (b), in a measure to be introduced in the Senate.

The right-to-work law makes it legal for states to outlaw closed shops — those requiring all workers to join the union. That, according to labor, makes it much harder to collect enough dues to keep a union local going).

The NLRB section of the measure will focus on eliminating delay and strengthening Board powers to punish employers who break the law. At present, says Rep. Thompson, the limited Board powers are "as effective as hunting lions with a pea shooter."

The Board now has power only to remedy violations of the law — not punish the violators. It can order workers reinstated if they have been illegally fired; it can force payment of back wages (minus payments a worker has received in the interim from another job or unemployment insurance)·



Indictments handed

DETROIT: Indictments against more than a dozen underworld figures and Teamsters officials reportedly were part of a seven-month effort by federal officials to crack the Jimmy Hoffa case. One of those recent indictments was against Anthony D. Giacalone (L), son of reputed mafia figure Anthony J. Giacalone. The elder Giacalone was the man Hoffa told his family he was going to meet the day he disappeared. The younger Giacolone was indicted on four counts of perjury in connection with testimony he gave at his father's income tax evasion trial last year. Giacolone arrives at the U.S. Marshal's Office with his attorney Joseph M. Dillon (UPI)

News in Brief

Flynt wants 'free press'

BOSTON [AP] — Larry Flynt, publisher of Hustler magazine, was in Boston yesterday setting up a national organization he said would be called "Americans For a Free Press."

Flynt, convicted in Ohio two months ago of pandering obscenity and engaging in organized crime, is establishing the new organization, he said, to help fight for a free press under the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

Plan limits insurance costs

BOSTON [AP] — The Liberty Mutual Insurance Co. has a voluntary plan to limit automobile insurance increases in Massachusetts to the 25 per cent ceiling proposed by Gov. Michael S. Dukakis.

The campany announced yesterday that there is "near agreement in principle" with Insurance Commissioner James M. Stone. Details were not released.

Strike causes mail delay

NEW YORK [AP] — The longshoremen's strike against major containership companies will delay some overseas mail, a Postal Service spokesman indicated yesterday.

The spokesman said that for now it will leave overseas mail aboard ships struck by longshoremen but it might remove mail already moved to piers.

Longshoremen are staging a selective strike against seven major container-ship lines.

Underworld infiltrates Cape

BOSTON [AP] — Organized crime is laundering its ill-gotten gains in Cape Cod restaurants and cheating the state of taxes on the supposedly legitimate operations, The Boston Herald American reported yesterday.

The newspaper said the underworld-controlled restaurants, which were not named, were uncovered by an investigation in the tax department of Cape restaurants that together owe the state more than $1 million.

Possible fee for Corcorde

WASHINGTON [AP] — The supersonic Concorde jetliner should be charged almost $4,000 if allowed to take off at night from Boston's Logan Airport, the Council on Wage Price Stability said in a special study to determine the feasibility of reducing airport noise by assessing special landing and take-off fees.

The fees would be based on the amount of noise an airplane makes on take-off or landing and would prompt airlines to use quieter airplanes, the study said.

Fire ravages race track

CHERRY HILL, N.J. [AP] — About 10,000 persons fled a fire that destroyed the 35-year-old clubhouse at Garden State Park race track here yesterday and heavily damaged the adjacent grandstand areas.

A fire chief died fighting the blaze and 15 persons were injured as 50 fire companies from Camden County and Philadelphia trained hoses on the flames.

The fire began during the sixth race at 4:20 p.m. and was extinguished two hours later.

Judge wants Bailey extradited

PROVIDENCE, R.I. [UPI] — A Superior Court judge yesterday said he thinks state Rep.-elect William Bailey should be extradited to Michigan but felt a higher court's decision to grant bail stands in the way.

"This court has no longer the authority to order the defendant held without bail, which in my opinion, should be the ruling," Judge William M. Mackenzie said. He continued the case until Wednesday to give lawyers for Bailey and the state time to take their arguments to the Rhode Island Supreme Court.

Lawyer John A. O'Neill Jr. said activist attorney William Kunstler and Georgia legislator Julian Bond would appear in support of Bailey if the high court hears the case Tuesday.

Last week, the Supreme Court reversed MacKenzie's decision to jail Bailey and freed him on $500 cash bond.

Whaling is issue

AUGUSTA, Maine [UPI] — Rep. David F. Emery, R-Maine, said yesterday he is sponsoring a resolution asking the State Department to seek compliance with the rules of the International Whaling Commission by four whaling nations.

Behind the SALT deadlock

WASHINGTON [PNS] — Neither of the easy explanations for the recent collapse of the SALT talks — Soviet intransigence or the blunt diplomatic style of the Carter Administration — illuminate what really happened in Moscow.

Rather, that stunning failure is more deeply rooted in such intangibles as the "atmospherics" of current U.S.-Soviet relations, the domestic political problems of both nations and the peculiar characteristics of the arms race.

In the end, the mixture proved not only unstable but, from the Soviet view, explosive.

Certainly diplomatic style played a role. Carter's sudden initiative for major cuts in nuclear missiles and long-range bombers, leaked in advance to the press, made the normally cautious men in the Kremlin nervous. They were already on the defensive from Carter's campaign attacks on detente and his willingness to use human rights as a club to seek internal changes in the Soviet system.

But while Soviet leaders have been known to swallow their pride in pursuit of diplomatic goals, the Carter Administration appears to have underestimated the importance of what diplomats call "atmospherics": the events of the moment making up the prevailing political mood. These have a powerful effect on negotiations, which are much like a ballet. There is a time to dance and a time to rest. The pas de deux in Moscow was clearly ill-timed.

The history of arms negotiations shows how easily outside events have a way of intruding into talks and breaking the momentum.

The original SALT talks were delayed a year because of the invasion of Czechoslovakia. Eight years earlier the revelation of the U-2 flights over the Soviet Union aborted Eisenhower's efforts at arms control.

From the Soviet perspective, the "atmospherics" today are no less discouraging. The Paul Warnke nomination as chief negotiator barely passed the Senate, where the hardliners mustered enough votes to demonstrate they could block any treaty that took a "soft" approach to the Soviets.

And American trade unions, including the liberal United Auto Workers, have vigorously supported new weapons programs, particularly the B-1 bomber, because they represent tens of thousands of defense jobs.

In addition, recent U.S.-Soviet deals, such as the trade agreement and the peaceful nuclear explosives treaty, have either languished unratified by Congress or been subjected to amendments, such as the Jackson amendment on emigration, which the Soviets consider unacceptable. The 1974 Threshold Test Ban Treaty is still unratified, though both nations are nevertheless observing it.

The human rights campaign, too, has injected a real or imagined cloud of cynicism into the atmosphere of U.S.-Soviet relations. Carter's moral outrage about Soviet dissidents — which is never extended to particular victims of official murder and torture in Chile, Brazil, Argentina, Iran and other members of the "Free World" — must be viewed from the Kremlin as a double-edged propaganda campaign.

Carter's "hang tough" attitude on Soviet human rights may also look like a pragmatic attempt to outflank right-wing anti-Soviet sentiment in the U.S., thus neutralizing conservative opposition to arms control.

While the Soviets may abide this aspect of the human rights issue, another aspect is quite unacceptable to them. The Carter rhetoric represents a throwback to the earlier days of the Cold War when an explicit goal of U.S. disarmament policy was to force internal changes in Soviet society.

The current campaign repudiates the Kissinger doctrine that a mutually satisfactory arms agreement was possible without internal reforms. That policy held that freedom inside the Soviet Union could evolve gradually through reduced tension and increased contacts with the outside world. The doctrine appealed to some in the Soviet establishment, who would like to see a gradual, controlled thaw toward a more tolerant Soviet society.

But such a prospect is quite different from the highly publicized U.S. human rights campaign, which feeds expectations in both countries that the U.S. will use its power to reform the Soviet system.

Cuban-Soviet plot revealed

KINSHASA, Zaire [UPI] — President Mobutu Sese Seko's government yesterday reported killing "many" rebels, seizing Soviet-made arms and uncovering hundreds of thousands of dollars in counterfeit money in a "decisive" drive to crush a six-week-old insurrection in Shaba province.

The official Zaire news agency said the counterfeit money was proof of a Soviet-Cuban conspiracy to destroy Zaire's economy.

The counterattack, begun late last week to try to dislodge an estimated 2,000 insurgents from copper-rich former Katanga province, was proceeding well, a government spokesman said.

He said Zaire forces had penetrated 12 miles into the rebel-held territory.

The spokesman said Zaire troops in heavy weekend fighting killed "many mercenaries from Angola" and captured two prisoners of undisclosed nationality.

Diplomatic sources said as many as 70 government troops were wounded and an undetermined number killed.

The advancing government forces also captured 40 cases of rifles, rockets and mines "all made in the Soviet Union," along with nearly a half million dollars worth of counterfeit American and Zaire currency and a small amount of Angolan money.

As to the counterfeit money, the government news agency AZAP said: "This discovery confirms the existence of a plot mounted by the Russian-Cuban coalition and destined to destroy the economy of the country at a time when the Zairean authorities, with the aid of the International Monetary Fund, the World Bank, and certain consortiums of private banks, are getting ready a plan for economic recovery."

Diplomatic sources said the gloom that had surrounded Mobutu's embattled government had lifted somewhat with the report of the offensive and the capital was now confident of a military victory over the rebels.

The spokesman said foreign journalists would be taken to southern Zaire Wednesday to interview the captured prisoners and visit the front.

The government announced th start of the counterattack Thursday and almost immediately, government troops clashed with rebels north and south of Kanzenze, 24 miles west of Kolwezi.

WASHINGTON: UN Amb. Andrew Young appears before the Senate Foreign Relation's subcommittee on Africa. (UPI)

Young advocates 'peaceful change'

WASHINGTON [UPI] — U.N. ambassador Andrew Young said yesterday he firmly believes peaceful change is possible in South Africa, whose white government he described as "non-representative."

"I'm one of the few who want non-violent and peaceful change in South Africa. I firmly believe peaceful change is possible in South Africa," said Young, who seemed upset over publicity given his recent statement in which he questioned that government's legality.

Speaking to reporters after appearing before the Senate African affairs subcommittee, Young — whose outspoken views on Africa were strongly endorsed and encouraged yesterday by Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey, D-Minn. — said he is not worried about his statements.

He said he was worried "about what you guys make of them... you are making policy out of a grunt."

He referred to an interview last week in which he was asked whether he considered the South African government illegitimate. He answered: "Yeah." Asked yesterday if that remains his position, he said:

"Let's say that South Africa's government is non-representative."

Asked about criticism of his statements by R.F. Botha, the South African foreign minister, Young said, "Mr. Botha is running for re-election on May 11 and I don't mind if I can help him by him picking on me."

He said South African criticism of him "helps our credibility in the United Nations."

Young also drew criticism on the House floor, where Rep. James Martin, R-N.C., called for his resignation because "what he is doing is like waving lighted sparklers around in a gasoline depot."

"I think he should resign and go look for another line of work," Martin said.

Martin said after only two months in office Young has "terrified our allies, insulted the British, insulted the Arabs, made life miserable for the majority of black Angolans, misunderstood the rebellion in Zaire, incited revolution in South Africa and Rhodesia."

"Cubans are the only ones he has praised, as a 'stabilizing factor' in Angola. They stabilize you up side the head," Martin said.

But a State Department spokesman, Hodding Carter III, minimized the department's disagreement with Young over the ambassador's suggestion that Cubans were an element of stability.

Blindness can be prevented through proper eye care

By DON ROBINSON
Environmental Health and Safety

People's fear of blindness is second only to their fear of cancer, according to an international Gallup Poll. But too many people don't translate that fear into preventive action.

According to a staff optometrist at the University Health Services, "One of man's most precious possessions is his eyes. Yet, each year, serious accidents occur in schools and industries throughout the country involving visual damage and loss of sight. Our UMass community involves students, instructors, professors, visitors and employes in many potentially hazardous situations which greatly contribute to eye risk and injury."

Don Robinson, director of Environmental Health and Safety for the University, adds, "The failure of all individuals working in or visiting eye hazardous areas to make full use of appropriate eye and face protectors of industrial quality is the primary reason for eye injuries and loss of sight. Prevention of injury and loss of sight can best result from effective eye safety awareness and action."

In the United States, almost 1,000 people are blinded each year by eye injuries, and each year, an estimated 167,000 school-age children suffer eye injuries.

Today, about half the population wears eyeglasses. Millions more wear sunglasses. If you or a member of your family are one of them — and if your glasses were purchased before January, 1972 — you're probably walking around with pieces of easily shattered glass suspended one-half inch in front of your eyes.

Types of Lenses — Effective Jan. 1, 1972 the U.S. Food and Drug Administration made it mandatory that all eyeglasses and sunglasses be impact-resistant. That means that there are now two basic kinds of impact-resistant glasses: industrial safety impact-resistant glasses and non-industrial impact-resistant glasses. Only industrial safety impact-resistant glasses are acceptable for use in eye hazardous areas. Non-industrial impact-resistant glasses are also called "ophthalmic", "streetwear" or "dress" glasses.

There is no such thing as unbreakable lenses or shatter-proof lenses. It is believed that impact-resistant lenses will break into small dull-edged particles or simply crumble as opposed to untreated or unhardened lenses that may shatter into needle-like splinters of glass potentially causing more damage. Protective lenses can also be made in non-prescription, plano, form.

Some people are still wearing corrective glasses prescribed and bought before 1972. One reason: some may have had an eye exaaination since the FDA ruling went into effect three years ago — but examination revealed no need for a new lens prescription. If that applies to you or a family member, the message still stands. But a new pair of impact — resistant or safety glasses even if your prescription hasn't been changed.

Glass or plastic — Whether you choose impact-resistant dress glasses or industrial-strength safety glasses, you have a choice of two lens materials: Hardened glass or optical-grade plastic.

Glass lenses can be either heat-tempered or chemically hardened, but pitting and scratching can weaken both.

Plastic lenses are much stronger than both types of hardened glass. Yet they weigh only half as much and are equal to glass in light transmittance. However, plastic lenses are more easily scratched, and this is a definite disadvantage. To minimize scratching, they should be cleaned with soap and water and dried with a soft towel or tissue.

Contact lenses afford some degree of protection to the eyes, because they are made of plastic, but are no substitute for corrective protective lenses in a non-flammable frame. When a person is wearing contact lenses and is engaged in eye-hazardous activities, plano protective lenses in a non-flammable frame should be worn to insure more complete protection.

The University has established an agreement with an area optician to provide industrial safety eye, at a reduced rate, for students, faculty, staff and employes of the University who work or study in eye-hazardous areas. To take advantage of this service, students are encouraged to obtain authorization at the University Health Services Eye Clinic, located across from Clinic III, and employes from the Environmental Health and Safety office, located in Morrill Science Building, room 414.

You Can Find Your Future in the Legal Profession

If you are seeking a career opportunity — WSU offers several ways in which you can enter the legal profession. Full-Time Students: Can earn a J.D. Degree and be eligible to take the California State Bar Examination in 2½ or 3 years. Part-Time Students: Can graduate in 3½ or 4 years of study with the same degree as a full-time student by attending class an average of 3 times per week, 3 hours per class. There are schedules to fit many needs — classes are offered days, evenings and weekends. Western State University College of Law has a Whole Person Admissions Policy - applicants are screened for academic background, personal aptitude, general experience, maturity and motivation. Applications are now being accepted for Fall Semester from men and women with two or more years of college credits. To obtain catalog fill out and mail advertisement to either of our two campuses.

A perfect day

Saturday morning I got out of bed and called Joe Barbanel. It was about 8:30 and he was in Troy, New York.

True, this scenario is not particularly noteworthy on the face of it, but it was to mark the beginning of my first perfect day. Not just an exceptional day, but a perfect day.

Though we were scheduled to play the R.P.I. Frisbee team in Troy that day, we were destined to go to Halifax Gorge in Halifax, Vermont. Joe had neglected to reserve a field for the game with us (the UMass Ultimate Frisbee team), and because it was such a beautiful day, the municipal fields would certainly be full.

It was my undesirable task to inform the team that the game would not be played — and this would be especially difficult, because people had been planning on this trip all season long.

Jim Moore and Michael Lichtman were the first two-players I met, as they arrived outside my apartment to go to breakfast before the trip. I picked up my walking stick and walked out calmly to greet them. After setting the stage and leading up to the point where I would break the news, I told them very matter of factly that the game had been canceled and that there was a chance we might play U.N.H. but that we might want to go for a ride and picnic to enjoy the day instead.

Since I had been to the gorge the previous weekend, I suggested it as a possible destination. Jim and Michael heartily agreed. After we ate I went to face the team while they changed for the trip north. After a lot of cajoling of many disappointed and disgruntled players, all were resolved to go to the gorge.

There was plenty of food for the day and there were plenty of inebriants for the ride. Shortly before we got to Conway Center, we stopped at a waterfall off 116 North. Before we left the falls to head on to the gorge, Jim's boundless enthusiasm led him, Michael and I to make our way through a culvert resplendent with running stream. Not all that easy a task, we eventually made it through and the escapade proved to be a rallying point as all had new energy for the trip on to the gorge.

While we were all a bit disappointed that there were a number of other people at the gorge after we had made the beautiful drive to get there, we spent the next three hours hopping from rock to rock constantly trying to get a better perspective on the swirling waters.

The ride home was beautiful and Jim, Bill Junker, Michael and I agreed that we were some of the luckiest guys in the world. This superlative was only the beginning. Later, after a barbecue at Jim's we heard Barb play her guitar and sing all night. And when I proclaimed that the day had been the first perfect day of my life, all, as could be expected, laughed. But they also knew what I had meant and nodded in agreement.

Though there are good and bad points from the trip that can be pointed to, the day was simply perfect — ask anyone who was there that day.

Resources Judaica appeals for senate support

To the Editor:

During the past week, the University community witnessed the commemoration of Holocaust Remembrance week. Resources Judaica sponsored and helped sponsor many of the events that attempted to raise the consciousness of the entire community. There was a substantial turnout at these programs. On April 24th Resources Judaica is sponsoring various programs in conjunction with a celebration of Israel Independence Day. There will be displays of Israeli and Middle Eastern literature and wares, an Israeli dance troupe, folk singers, and other entertainment, all open to the entire community.

On this Wednesday night, the Student Senate will be voting on the final acceptance of proposed budgets, for all SATF funded RSO groups, for the next fiscal year. Resources Judaica, to date, has applied for and been denied funding for next year by SATF monies three times.

Resources Judaica, which was funded this past year, is an organization which promotes Jewish awareness, and serves as an outlet for Jewish expression.

The Senate has given many reasons for denying Resources Judaica funding. They state that it is a religious organization. IT IS NOT! The Senate claims that funding Resources Judaica would set a precedent for funding all types of cultural, ethnic, and racial groups. Was not that precedent set years ago with the funding of other minority groups? Since Resources Judaica first received funding, there has not been an increase in similar groups applying for SATF monies.

A member of the Senate stated that there are 3,000 Jews on campus, and if they all contributed one dollar, Resources Judaica would then have sufficient funds. Whereas this method of support was not suggested to other similar organizations, I feel this is an absurd argument, based on the false stereotype of Jewish affluence.

Resources Judaica now appeals to the entire UMass community to be present and show their support at the Senate meeting this Wednesday night [CC 101, 7:00 p.m.], when the budget will be voted on. Without funding, the programs that Resources Judaica now sponsors will no longer be presented, and the organizations' own existence will be at stake. The UMass community will no doubt be at a loss without an organization and programming of this type. Hopefully, with the support of the community, the Student Senate will see what a vital necessity Resources Judaica is on this campus, and grant the organization funding for the next fiscal year.

Hearing to discuss household restrictions

To the Editor:

Wednesday night at 7:30 in Town Hall the Amherst Planning Board will hold a public hearing on proposed zoning changes to be voted on at Town Meeting in May. Among these are articles sponsored by the Amherst Tenants Association which would remove the restriction on the number [four] of "unrelated" persons presently permitted to live together in Amherst.

The present bylaw defines an "unrelated" family as "A group of unrelated individuals, not to exceed four, residing cooperatively in one dwelling unit." The unrelated family is further restricted from taking in boarders.

The ATA believes these restrictions are discriminatory on the basis of lifestyle, and that enforcement can be arbitrary and discretionary. [Recall the case last summer of an unrelated family on Carriage Lane.] We tried to effect changes in this bylaw by working with the Housing Committee of the Planning Board. The Committee was not receptive to our proposals and ended up failing its charge by not recommending any changes in this bylaw to Town Meeting.

The changes recommended by the ATA would either 1] change the definition to "A group of individuals residing cooperatively in one dwelling unit," or 2] allow an unrelated family of four to take in up to three boarders, space permitting.

The ATA and others estimate there are over 100 homes in town where five or more persons reside. We take this opportunity to inform residents of this hearing, and urge representatives [and neighbors] of THESE "illegal" households to attend the hearing and explain to those present the economic, social and other reasons for their choice of lifestyle.

Ralph A. Daniels
Amherst Tenants Association

State hospital faced with dilemmas

By JUDITH STEIN

Northampton State Hospital is visited weekly by an average of eight to fifteen UMass volunteers. This program began with the objective of entertaining and enlightening the patients on Thursday evening but has slowly evolved into an organization which accomplishes the above as well as bringing self-gratification and fulfillment to those volunteers who participate on a regular basis. Many such individuals have formed close attachments to particular residents while others prefer to work in group activities or mingle throughout the brief two hour period. In any one of those evenings such activities as BINGO, card games, dancing.... or ping pong may be indulged in with the guidance of the staff and cooperation of the volunteers.

The hospital, itself, houses individuals from the western area of Massachusetts such as Franklin, Chicopee and Springfield. It concentrates entirely on mental illness whereby many of the residents have suffered from nervous breakdowns or have lost their direction in life and go to the hospital for guidance and security. It is the volunteers' concern to comfort, relax and engage in conversation with these people. It is their aim to alter the set activities which are consistent throughout the week. These interactions seem fine to an outsider but from a close perspective, Northampton State Hospital is faced with many dilemmas which can be resolved but do not look very promising in the near future.

One such difficulty is the lack of participation and aid from outside sources. The University of Massachusetts houses over 20,000 people with, ironically, only about a dozen students willing to sacrifice three hours a week. Many claim that the program is too disorganized but any suggestions and comments are welcome and fully taken into account. Since the program has come into existence, many reforms have occurred in its development with respect to the activities with the Hospital's residents and discussion sections were established for the UMie volunteers to discuss their varying experiences.

The Hospital is faced with financial difficulties. While many patients suffer from physical ailments as well as mental deficiencies there is an understaff of professional personnel such as physicians and psychologists to care for the excessive amount of patients. Rehabilitation furthermore plays a secondary role in relation to proper housing which is no fault of the staff's, but the total responsibility of insufficient government funding. One patient said, "The Doctor visits me every day but I never get a chance to talk to him. He's not here long enough to listen." This complaint is shared by many.

A solution to this problem could be more allocation of funds so that rehabilitation could go into effect — as improvements increase, the patients will be permitted to leave and in the long run less money will be needed. Ultimately the state would be saving money and "aiding a multitude of people", as one volunteer acknowledged.

With the relatively few people who are released the majority of them return to the Hospital after a short duration. Many prefer to remain in the Hospital after having voluntarilty committed themselves and can be released whenever they feel ready. The problem is their inability to "cope with the world." Quite a number "have no family to return 'home' to and have absolutely no experience for employment." The state does not help provide for those individuals who really want to become independent so that the limited amount of funds go toward the Hospital, which merely blankets the difficulties involved but does not encourage or direct these residents into a normal life style.

Many people do not understand mental illness since it takes form in many ways and various degrees. Many found that life beyond the Hospital's boundaries was "too drastic a step — people don't easily accept you. Besides that there was no where to go and no way to eat except with the little social security money I obtain."

The staff puts in many hours planning recreational activities and seeing to the basic needs of the people but this is not enough. More interest and concern must be taken in order to literally and figuratively unlock the doors and open up a new life to these misguided and needy individuals.

School of hard knocks

When I first woke up, I looked around for the sound that had woken me, sure that it wasn't my alarm. A high scream shot across the room. It was a woman's scream, coming from the apartment across the courtyard. There were sounds of a domestic quarrel and then silence. All of a sudden a man came running out of the apartment, chased by the woman who had screamed. The door slammed and he drove off.

I thought I could just go back to sleep; after all, it was all over. That semi-sleep was interrupted by the sounds of a child screaming for help, crying out to his mother to stop throwing him against the wall. The beating seemed to go on forever, but when I got up to call the police, all was silence again, but I wasn't going to be able to go back to sleep.

Images of the children I had worked with, the children beaten until they were emotionally or physically handicapped, ran like demons through my head. None of them would be normal, none of them would forget. What would happen to the child across the courtyard, the victim of his mother's blind anger?

There are a lot of myths about child abuse. People believe that only poor or alcoholic parents, single or desperate parents beat their children. People believe that once it stops the children will simply bounce back, unscarred, to love again. Or else they believe that only children who were beaten as children will beat or abuse their children when they become adults.

One thing that isn't a myth is the fact that child abuse in this country has reached terrifying proportions. Millions of children die each year due to abuse. Millions of abuses are not reported. And millions of children grow up with the fear that at anytime a person who loves them will suddenly turn on them.

The truth is that any one of us have the potential to do just that. One day the pressure from the outside world will drive all our anger to the surface and we may take that anger out on the nearest, safest person. No child will hit back, no child can run that far away.

The fact that we could be the child abusers of the future should scare us into learning all we can about it. There are people and places to go to for help. There is information available, but you have to want to find it; it isn't going to be forced on you.

Sure there are laws that protect children now, but the courts are not so quick to take children out of their natural homes until something really drastic happens. That is why it is better to know now, what you can do if this kind of a problem happens to your family, or to people you care about.

Child abuse is not that rare that you can ignore it. The fact that its effects are growing across class boundaries and educational boundaries should make you want to stop it. Children are people too, but they need bigger, more powerful people to protect their rights. You will be seeing the media raising this issue more and more. Don't turn off to it, listen. If not for yourself, for the people in the courtyard across from you.

Hail the Inhail!

By STEVE DUBIN
Collegian Staff

Smoke rises over the congested chattering crowd. Reaching for cigarettes, many re-run in their foggy minds the gnawing question, "When can I stop smoking these low tar and nicotine, charcoal, recessed filter tipped, menthol, extra-long, tobacco sticks?" At the same time non-smokers contemplate, "Why does this shmuck behind me have to use my sweatshirt hood as an ashtray?"

There are many pressures keeping people from ridding themselves of this dirty habit. Many factors are to be considered.

I, a rookie smoker, have just developed a respectable smoker's hack. Waking with coughs and a wheeze can be depended upon like phone bills, flat tires, and rain on week-ends. In these days of unpredictability, who can toss out such a stabilizer?

Can't stop now! My new car is the first I've owned with a "working" cigarette ligher. Flaunt it or fling it?

Outdoorsmen celebrate the coming spring. The season is just as important to smokers. Warmer weather eradicates the possibility of an ungloved hand becoming a piece of ice sculpture while holding a butt in chilly winds. The mild weather is perfect for flicking ashes out of car windows. And who can resist sucking on a cancer weed on a quiet walk in the woods? This is a charitable act, sharing the smoke with poor animals and plants unable to buy or roll their own.

Too late now! I've just been given a handsome set of hand-crafted Indian ashtrays. I'm also on the verge of collecting enough "Old Gall" coupons to trade for a free lung removal, or a complete wardrobe void of burn holes.

Often ignored is the function of cigarettes as a social vehicle. Bumming and lending stogies can be the foundation of a long lasting relationship. You never know when you'll meet again on an operating table somewhere. The cigarette is also a great prop. Like a conductors wand, it punctuates the tempo of a conversation.

What are thick steaming cups of coffee; good throaty beer; or a smooth hard liquor without a biting smoke to compliment them? What is Spic without Span. Fuller without Brush?

Quit now? How can I? After all the beneficial things smoking has done for me. It even takes care of the jingling nuisance from my pockets. I dump loose change into vending machines to purchase packs of "Virginia Slums," Disad Vantage," and "Sail 'ems."

Can I quit smoking? I don't know, but ashes are good for my rug anyway.

Moneygrubbing; it's all around

By STEVE ZISSON
Collegian Staff

Although I hate to deal in "should be's", I feel it is absolutely essential here.

Spring should be the time of year for good entertainment, idealism, daydreaming, a little of the old fashioned sitting in the midday sun and of course, romantic rituals and pursuits. But, alas, Spring has become the season of financial worrying. The deadline for filing Income Tax returns falls conveniently during the time when characteristically, many people aren't thinking straight. Perfect timing.

For example, lately, the financial difficulties of coordinating a responsible Spring concert have come under fire. And rightly so. The concert should have been set months ago in the dead of winter when artists were readily available and cooler heads prevailed. Heads have become so hot recently that they've agreed to a "free" concert. Who's free? What's free? What the hell do they mean by free?

A free concert is a concert costing $25,000 (out of student money) amassing together a bunch of talented lesser known groups. Christ, these groups might even be classified as "cult", heaven forbid we have cults represented at a uMASS concert, a big name artist is a must. Anyway, you, the student, can take it or leave it because it's FREE.

So much for the entertainment this Spring; fortunately there are more important things to think about in the Spring. Summer jobs. Money has to be made by those who are planning to return to school next semester. Jobs have to be secured to be secure.

Some people aren't returning next semester. The graduating seniors face a "bleak job market". (Consider the preceding quote from Time magazine). Some will take jobs they are overqualified for. Some will take jobs in factories. A select few will get the jobs they have planned their lives for. Many will turn to a life of crime.

Bankrobbing, because of budget cuts, is not a course taught at this University. Some people have turned to crimes they do know and are taught at this University. Over the past four years the graduating seniors have been schooled in the ways of Watergate. They know most of the tricks of the trade including patronage, bribery and nepotism. And a cute cabal have put these practical tricks to use while they are still here, on campus. Jealous because they got the jump on you? Probably. (Incidently, this cabal will get a rhetorical exemption from watching on television, a Watergate studies refresher course scheduled for May. Lecturers are David Frost and Richard Nixon. Format: Question and Hopefully Get An Answer).

News Item: Coordinating Committee of the Student Senate overrules Budget Committee and approves $7500 job (remember the $7 increase?) for a qualified person to be assistant to the co-presidents.

Question: Who'll get the job? Multiple choice. Choose one. A) Former SGA president B) Former office of communications director C) Peter Frampton D) Stevie Wonder Wouldn't it be nice to create a job that you, the creator, are the most qualified for? There is no way to miss getting it. Financial security. Yahoo! National security.

News Item: Name Artist Signed for Spring Concert, Free Concert Proves Unrealistic.

Question: Who is the artist? Multiple choice. Choose one. A) Former SGA President B) Ray Davies C) Peter Frampton D) Stevie Wonder

The answer to both questions is C. Stevie Wonder was the overwhelming choice despite being black, handicapped, and unable to dance, but unfortunately he insisted he was free, since 1863 and declined. So Peter Frampton had to be chosen, a little cultish, but he should be great, naturally. For $7500 how can you go wrong?

Print shop found uncooperative

To the Editor:

The Campus Center Print Shop has an attraction by being located in the concourse area. This gives this shop an advantage over any local competition because of the easy accessibility to the university community.

Unfortunately, I [and many others] have found that this convenience is not appealing enough. Their often uncooperative attitude has discouraged us so as to bring our business to local printers in Amherst.

Needing to have table tents printed up for the upcoming Southwest Assembly election, I approached the Print Shop for an estimate and details on Monday, April 11. The prices quoted were more than reasonable, but the actual work would take "about a week." I return on Tuesday, April 12 to place the order; and on Wednesday, April 13, I was informed that the 250 copies would not be ready until around Thursday, April 21 — they would call me when the work was completed. Obviously, this was not feasible as Southwest Assembly election day is April 21.

Not satisfied with this proposed arrangement, I went to a printer located on University Drive. After explaining the importance of these table tents, I was told that if they had the copy Thursday morning, April 14, the work would be done by Tuesday, April 19.

Whereas the attitude of the Campus Center Print Shop was that of hurriedness and lack of cooperation, the private printer showed honest concern and an appreciation of the importance of the job. Needless to say, their customer relations won them the job.

I urge the Campus Center Print Shop, as well as other service groups on campus, to adopt a more cooperative attitude when dealing with their customers.

Governance vs. unionism mix-up

To the Editor:

Your front page article on April 12, "Staffers may consider union," gave the impression that the Professional Association of UMass-Amherst [PAUMA] and the Professional Staff for Collective Bargaining [PSCB] are one and the same organizations. That is not the case. PAUMA is the governance unit for professional staff, like the Faculty Senate and the Student Senates. The PSCB is a separate organization to establish a union for professional staff.

Socialist candidate to speak here

To the Editor:

Leaders of the Socialist Workers Party are touring the United States speaking on "Prospcects for Socialism in America." As part of this spring tour the Amherst Young Socialist Alliance will be presenting Catarino Garza, the SWP candidate for mayor of New York City. Ganza will be on the UMass campus Wednesday, April 20, at 8:30 in CC 915.

The 1977 New York City elections will be the first since the bankers and politicians declared a "fiscal crisis" there two years ago. For New Yorkers, this has meant two years of layoffs, wage freezes, and shrinking social services.

Ganza emphasizes the need for working people to have political representation independent of the Democrat and Republican parties: '... when you vote for a Democrat or a Republican, you're really voting for the bankers. That's why working people need our own party, a labor party.'

We urge all students, faculty, staff, and community members to attend, this meeting. Though Gatarino Ganza's campaign is centered in NYC, it addresses issues and problems with potential relevance to all of us.

Program presented on taxation careers

Delta Nu, the UMass chapter of Beta Alpha Psi, The National Accounting Fraternity, is presenting a program on careers in federal taxation today at 7 p.m. in Campus Center 904-908. The program will consist of a panel of four speakers who are each highly qualified within their specialized fields of federal taxation. Careers for federal taxation within the IRS, Equal Opportunity Employment Agency, and the Department of Justice will be presented.

The purpose of this free program is to introduce and acquaint students to the many types of employment open to them within the field of federal taxation.

Spend a month in Ireland

Full-time students between the ages of 18 and 30 interested in the Encounter Ireland program July 14 to August 12 may qualify for $300 scholarships. These are given by the Union of Students in Ireland (USI) to reduce the cost of the program, which includes transatlantic transportation, from $760 to $460.

Encounter Ireland is designed to introduce American students to varied aspects of Irish life. During the first three weeks students are guests of Dublin families, with room and all meals provided. Planned events for program members include a visit to the Abbey Theatre, a half-day tour of the Wicklow Mountains area, and a series of six informal discussions on Irish history and politics.

The final week is free for independent travel through the Irish countryside, with an unlimited rail travel ticket supplied. For information on applying consult the International Programs Office, 239 Whitmore. Applications must reach the Council on International Educational Exchange in New York by May 30.

Open Hearing for P.E. school

The University community is invited to attend an open hearing to discuss issues relevant to sex discrimination within the School of Physical Education. The school includes the department of athletics, exercise science, professional preparation in physical education, and sport studies. The hearing will be from 11 a.m. to 1 p.m. in room 2231 Conference Room, Boyden. Those unable to attend may submit written comments prior to the hearing to Betty Spears, Department of Sport Studies, Curry Hicks Building.

Food Service seminar to be held

The Second Annual Food Service Systems Seminar is being held this week in the Campus Center Auditorium. The conference theme is "Optimization in Food Service."

More than 100 conferees are in attendance including food service industry managers, research administrators, food and beverage directors, dieticians, systems designers and analysts, and consultants. Participants come from around the U.S., as well as several international ones from England, France, Sweden and Iceland.

Six half-day sessions are being devoted to such food service industry segments as hotels, restaurants, airline feeding, in-plant feeding, and hospitals and other institutional settings. UMass faculty participants include: Prof. P.B. Manning, HRTA, Program Co-Chairperson, Prof. S.W. Fletcher, Head, HRTA; Prof. A.L. Wrisley, HRTA; and Prof. R.J. Gigglio, Industrial Engineering.

Spring Concert meeting tonight

There will be a Spring Concert meeting tonight at 7:30 in SBA 120 for persons interested in working on the concert. Attendance at previous Spring Concert meetings is not necessary.

People are needed for stage crew, hospitality security, clean-up, advertising and business. If you wish to participate in the Spring Concert, attendance at this meeting is necessary.

Travel guide copies available

Free copies of "America: The Datsun Student Travel Guide" will be available beginning Thursday. The guide, now in its fourth year of publication, contains information for student travellers. Distribution on campus, sponsored by the UMass Outing Club, will be available at the dining commons, the Campus Center Concourse, and the Student Union.

Before Sound Guard®, the only way to prevent your records from wearing out was not to play them.

Unprotected

Magnified, you can see record vinyl wearing away.

With Sound Guard

With same magnification, record vinyl shows no wear.

If you've played any record often enough, you've heard the inevitable occur. It wore out.

While "pops," "hisses," and other surface noises began making their appearance on your favorite records, high frequency sounds—like violins and flutes—began disappearing.

The villain behind this destruction is friction. (If a diamond cuts through steel, you can imagine what a diamond stylus does to vinyl records.) Fortunately, from outer space has come a solution to record degradation. It's called Sound Guard.*

A by-product of research into dry lubricants for aerospace applications, Sound Guard record preservative puts a microscopically-thin (less than 0.000003") dry film on records to protect the grooves from damage. Yet, remarkably, it does not degrade fidelity.

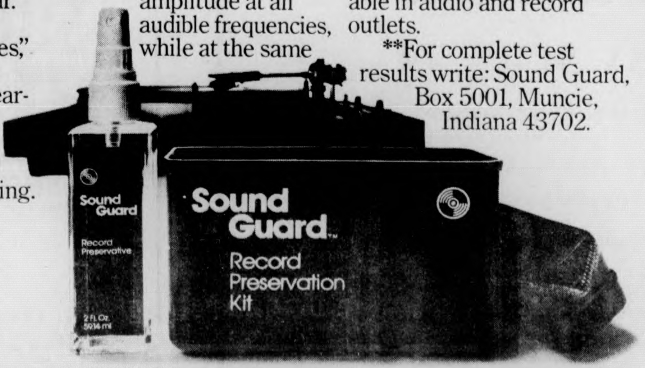
Independent [illegible]s show that Sound G[illegible]d preservative maintains full amplitude at all audible frequencies, while at the same time significantly retarding increases in surface noise and harmonic distortion.

In other words, when applied according to instructions, a new record treated with Sound Guard preservative and played 100 times sounds the same as one in "mint" condition played the first time!

Sound Guard preservative comes in a kit (complete with non-aerosol pump sprayer and velvet buffing pad). It is completely safe and effective for all discs, from precious old 78's to the newest LP's including CD-4's.

Recently introduced to audiophiles, Sound Guard preservative is now available in audio and record outlets.

For complete test results write: Sound Guard, Box 5001, Muncie, Indiana 43702.



Sound Guard® keeps your good sounds sounding good.

Print shop found uncooperative

To the Editor:

The Campus Center Print Shop has an attraction by being located in the concourse area. This gives this shop an advantage over any local competition because of the easy accessibility to the university community.

Unfortunately, I [and many others] have found that this convenience is not appealing enough. Their often uncooperative attitude has discouraged us so as to bring our business to local printers in Amherst.

Needing to have table tents printed up for the upcoming Southwest Assembly election, I approached the Print Shop for an estimate and details on Monday, April 11. The prices quoted were more than reasonable, but the actual work would take "about a week." I return on Tuesday, April 12 to place the order; and on Wednesday, April 13, I was informed that the 250 copies would not be ready until around Thursday, April 21 — they would call me when the work was completed. Obviously, this was not feasible as Southwest Assembly election day is April 21.

'Adam's Rib' shown tonight

A public showing of "Adam's Rib", starring Katharine Hepburn and Spencer Tracy will be held tonight at 8:00 in the School of Business Administration, room 120.

This showing will be co-sponsored by Women's Studies, UMass., and the Sex-Role Stereotype Project of the Amherst-Pelham School District. For further information contact: Kathy Salisbury 549-6098.

Human Sexuality workshop held

A workshop and film presentation on, "Human Sexuality and How it Relates to the Special Needs Individual," will be held today at 7 p.m. in Campus Center 168-170.

Julie Wolfe, sex education intern at Belchertown State School will facilitate discussion following the film, "Like Other People."

Schedule pamphlets distributed this week

There will be one schedule pamphlet with undergraduate, graduate and Stockbridge courses listed distributed this week for next semester. The distribution times are:

—for graduate students — available in the appropriate departments for pickup by graduate students on or about Friday, April 22.

—for undergraduates — available at noon, Thursday, April 21 on the Campus Center Concourse.

—for faculty — Schedule Pamphlets will be distributed by the Calendar & Schedule Office to departments this Thursday and Friday.

Students who fail to obtain a schedule pamphlet on Thursday may pick one up at the Calendar & Schedule Office in Whitmore after 2 p.m. April 21st as long as the supply lasts.

The number printed permits the distribution of one person.

Socialism lecture presented tomorrow

Catarino Garza, New York City mayoral candiate from the Socialist Workers party, will discuss the "Prospects for Socialism in America" tomorrow at 8:30 p.m. in Campus Center 914.

Garza's New York City campaign emphasizes the need for an independent labor party for working people. He calls for a socialist alternative to "the politicians who do nothing but continue the attacks on our standard of living and ensure profits for the banks."

Jewish commune film presented

Kibbutz Langdon — U.S.A., the ABC documentary which portrays a commune of young people seeking Jewish roots, will be shown tonight at 7 p.m. in SBA 116, free. This highly acclaimed film by Arthur Zegart captures the meaning and significance of the chavurah (commune) in contemporary Jewish life

Political Economy discussion held

A panel discussion on the political economy of Massachusetts will be held tonight in Thompson 104 at 8 p.m.

Topics to be covered by the speakers are the current business climate offensive in historical perspective, the state of union organizing in Western Mass in the recession of the 70's and on-campus organizing.

Among the speakers will be John Brouder — Low Income Planning Aid, Boston, Carrie Hemenway — Northampton, and Dotty Hayden — clerical worker at UMass-Amherst. For more information contact Joe Bowring, economics dept.

Summer camp interviews held

The following summer camps have scheduled on-campus recruiting dates to interview prospective camp counselors:

—Camp Winadu — a boys' summer camp in Pittsfield will interview in the Placement Office tomorrow.

—Camp Ma-Ho-Ge — A coeduational summer camp in Bethel, New York, will interview in the Placement Office on April 27.

Sign up for interviews in Hampshire House 208.

Open hearing; residential managing

Drinking problems?

Ninety per cent of the undergraduates at UMass use alcohol to some extent. With such a high drinking population, you are bound to find drinking problems. I'm not talking about liver cirrhosis or alcoholism. They are not major drinking problems among UMass students. I am referring to the problems that you and I, as drinkers, are apt to face.

Anyone who has experienced the morning-after headache, upset stomach, nausea and vomiting can agree with me that a hangover is definitely a drinking problem. Closely associated with the hangover is fatigue. If you go to sleep drunk (or pass out) you may feet exhausted even after a sound eight hours of sleep because the anesthetic effect of alcohol on the brain prevents you from entering the rapid eye movement (REM) phase, necessary to physical and emotional well-being. If REM is missed, you'll probably wake up cranky, irritable and tired.

Many physical injuries can be attributed to alcohol abuse. Alcohol depresses both the sensory and motor centers in the brain, resulting in loss of coordination. We all know how easy it is to fall or bang into anything when we are drunk. These falls can result in a variety of bumps, bruises and breaks, which can be serious.

Severe, often fatal, injuries can occur when a drunk person gets behind the wheel of a car. As blood alcohol concentration increases, the ability to make judgments and perform simple motor skills decreases, so the chances of getting in an accident are very high. Many people are not willing to admit that they are drunk, and will prove it by trying to drive. This type of behavior results in 43 per cent of all fatal car accidents.

We should be willing to admit that we can't drive when drunk. Find an alternative ride home, give your keys to someone who has not drunk as much, or if possible stay where you are for a few hours or overnight if necessary. And we can try to stop others from driving. Remember, friends don't let friends drive drunk.

Alcohol may release sexual inhibitions but it doesn't do much for sex itself. If a man drinks too much he may find that he is temporarily impotent. As Shakespeare put it, "Drink provokes the desire, but it takes away the performance".

While some people become friendly and outgoing when drunk others become morose, hostile and aggressive. How can drinking be pleasurable when it has such negative effects on behavior? That sure doesn't make you a pleasure to be around.

So here you have a few of the drinking problems that I see at UMass. I am sure that there are others. What can we do about them.

Begin by thinking about your own drinking patterns and why you drink. Is alcohol the main focal point or is it just a piece of the whole social setting? Does drinking help social relationships or does it hurt them? Do you gulp drinks rather than sip them? Do you drink on an empty stomach so you can get drunk faster? Do you insist that others drink with you or force drinks upon others? Are you afraid to say NO to alcohol or ask for an alternative beverage? Do you insist on driving even though you are drunk or do you let others drive who are drunk? Think about these questions the next time you are going to have a drink or two. You just may want to change a few things. It can't hurt to try. SKOAL!

YOUR BIRTHDAY by STELLA WILDER

Tuesday, April 19 — Born today, you are a person ruled by his moods. As a result, you are one whose days will be filled with the twists and turns that reflect your emotional changes. What you may contemplate with optimism at one time, you may consider with nothing but pessimism another. Those who must associate with you at work or at play may become confused by the mercurial nature of your personality; you, however, seem to be perfectly at home with the up's and down's created by that personality. Your ability to live at peace with yourself is far more important, far more vital to your ultimate success, whether in career matters of in society, than whether or not you are able to please others or leave them with stable feelings.

Although you often give the appearance of quiet, calm, reserve and general ease, in reality, of course, you are none of these. When you aren't outwardly reacting, you are responding inwardly -- indeed, you may be churning inwardly to such a degree that you cannot think as logically as you otherwise might. You would do well to respond less emotionally -- but that is like telling a cat to give up milk or a dog not to bark. Your nature is not to be denied-- which means you will in all likelihood continue to upset yourself and others by giving the lie to appearances.

You perplex others with the many facets of your character. But you also allow them much room for admiration and respect, for, in addition to your other traits are honesty, fairness and absolute appreciation for the good in other people. A certain restlessness of spirit keeps you on the verge of discontent at all times. A certain charm of personality enables you to gain support from others when and where you most need it.

Wednesday, April 20

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) — What seems to others to be an unresponsive attitude on your part may well be shock. Expect a surprise late in the day.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) — If you are in opposition to an idea, you would do well to say so. There is no percentage in pretending acquiescence.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) — A major goal should come within reach this afternoon. Take care not to tip your hand; prepare thoroughly for your next move.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) — Unless you can take the opinions of children for just what they are -- opinions only -- you are likely to be in a state of emotional upset by eve.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) — Take care of tough chores and routine matters early in the day. Afternoon and evening are for indulging yourself.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) — Take all the pleasure you can from minor happenings of the day. Major affairs will have to wait for a more auspicious time.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) — A falling out with friends of long standing causes considerable distress early in the day. By evening things look brighter.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) — Those who are critical may also be uninformed. Make an effort to get information to those who will make the decisions.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) — The praise that comes your way at this time is well deserved. Don't allow misplaced modesty to keep you from enjoying the fruits of your labor.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) — Another's extravagance threatens to spoil your day. Take action against one who would blame you for their own misdeeds.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) — Follow the dictates of your heart -- but be sure that what your heart desires is good also for satisfying your intellectual curiosity.

ARIES (March 21-April 19) — You can work out your own future if you are wise enough to judge well your own present. Experience brings you a new view of life.

Celts superb in opener...

PHILADELPHIA [UPI — With all their playoff experience, the Boston Celtics are anything but old and disabled. They will do lot of damage if you don't put them away once you have them down.

The Philadelphia 76ers learned that the hard way Sunday and at the same time relinquished the home court advantage in the NBA Eastern Conference semifinals.

"The Celtics die hard," said Philadelphia guard Doug Collins after the 76ers dropped a 113-111 decision on Jo Jo White's last second basket in the first game of the best-of-seven series.

Actually, the defending NBA champions didn't die at all Sunday. Down by 13 in the first half, the Celtics cut the lead to one twice in the third period. The 76ers rallied to go back up by nine and were in control of the game at the beginning of the fourth quarter.

However, the 76ers went the first 7:14 of the final period without a field goal and the persistent Celtics, as always, didn't waste the opportunity.

"They never give an inch but just kept working hard," Collins said. "They're a smart ball club. We never could turn the corner. We had a chance to really blow it open but we didn't score."

"I think they played a great game but I also think we played a great game," Boston coach Tom Heinsohn said. "I saved by best defensive people for the latter part of the game. If they do the job, we always have a chance."

"I always did feel pretty confident through the game," said John Havlicek, who appeared in a record 166th playoff game. "We were getting pretty decent shots. We had some good opportunities, too, and when we hit them we knew we weren't going to lose it."

For White, who scored just four points in the first half, it was a matter of being patient before getting hot in the second half, when he shot 8-for-13 and finished with 21 points.

"I wasn't getting my shots in the first half, but you just have to play your game," White said. "There's a lot of other things I could do to keep us in the game. The guys told me to keep shooting."

Philadelphia coach Gene Shue will have to make some adjustments in Wednesday's second game to keep the Atlantic Division champions from going down 2-0 before going to Boston for games Friday and Sunday.

Julius Erving, guarded by Havlicek most of the game, scored 36 points, but George McGinnis was held to six, four of them in the first 1:29 of the game.

"I feel like I have bad games against them because I press," McGinnis said. "I try to play well and the reverse happens. If I had a good game, we would have won."

...while B's hope to clinch

BOSTON [UPI] — The Boston Bruins, now leading Los Angeles 3-1 in their best-of-seven Stanley Cup playoff series, think they can wrap up the series tonight before their hometown fans.

The Kings, bolstered by a 7-4 win at the Forum Sunday night, think they can win in Boston and send the series back to California.

"Nobody said we'd take these guys in four straight," Boston goalie Gerry Cheevers said in Los Angeles after the fourth game. "I said before I'd be happy with a split here. So I'm happy."

Cherry said he thought the Bruins dropped the fourth game because of their failure to kill penalties but suggested they would not have the same trouble in the fifth match.

"If we can get four goals in Los Angeles and outshoot them 34 to 22," he said, "we can beat them in Boston."

Marcel Dionne, who scored a key goal for the Kings after the Bruins had trimmed an early 4-1 Los Angeles lead to 4-3, suggested that the next game could be the key one in the series.

"This feels a little better than when we were down 3-0," he said. "If we can win at Boston in the next one, it could change this series around real quick."

Kings coach Bob Pulford noted that every game in the series is now a must-win contest for his club.

"I still think we have a chance if we just play decent hockey," he explained, "but it's still sudden death from here on out.

"I'm proud of the way the players came back after their heartbreaking loss Friday night (a 7-6 defeat). But we're still not playing as well as we can."

Sunday night's game set two National Hockey League playoff records.

The Kings and Bruins, who won the first two games of the series 8-3 and 6-2 at home, now share one record for scoring 43 goals in the first four games of a Stanley Cup Series. The old mark of 36 was set by Boston and St. Louis five years ago.

BUFFALO, N.Y. [UPI] — An unemployed steelworker was placed on one year's probation yesterday for mailing a postcard threatening to blow up sportscaster Howard Cosell during a Monday night football game in 1973.

U.S.district Judge John T. Curtin gave the sentence to Marian G. Batko, 30, of Lackawanna, N.Y., but ruled out prison because it would be a hardship to the defendant's elderly mother, with whom Batko lives.

Netmen face Crusaders in apparent big mismatch

By MIKE SMOLENS
Collegian Staff

The UMass men's tennis team travels to Worcester this afternoon for what appears to be a mismatch as a strong Minuteman team takes on the suspiciously weak Crusaders of Holy Cross.

Suspiciously weak? "They're not supposed to be very strong," said UMass coach Bill Brown of the Crusaders, "but we must go in expecting a tough team."

Brown always remains skeptical and cautious when talking about the next match. He seems to fear overconfidence more than a strong opponent. Yesterday, however, he was more at ease than his usual pre-game mood allows. He admitted that his team should win and, with a little prying, that Holy Cross was weak.

It is not without reason that Brown's outlook is optimistic. His team faced three tough hurdles at the outset of the season and leaped them with reasonable success. The Minutemen upset Williams 5-4, whitewashed MIT 9-0 last Thursday, but faltered against Tufts, and lost 6-3. A win today would make that loss seem insignificant and boost UMass' record to 3-1.

Last year UMass whipped the Crusaders 8-1. The Minutemen should post an equally convincing win over Holy Cross today. However, Brown said the Minutemen will "have to be ready" for a tough match, because losing to a team UMass should beat easily "would be a shame."

Today's match, which takes the Minutemen halfway through their schedule, will be important for Adam Rosen and Alan Green, UMass' first and second singles players, in their quest to be seeded at the New England Championships in May.

Rosen and Green have shown they have the talent to win the rest of their matches, but with five more matches to go the two Minutemen will have to be consistently on their game to gain seedings at the New England's.

To be seeded in the New England's a player must have an undefeated record, according to Brown. Both Rosen and Green are 3-0 in singles and have good chances to be seeded, which would give them byes in the first round of the championships.

Although Holy Cross is the weak spot in the UMass schedule, Brown maintained that today's match was as important as any, especially concerning the New England's.

Chimps sink Middies, 9-8 for second straight triumph

By RUSS SMITH
Collegian Staff

The Chimps must've sensed it. If they didn't break the tie, and the game had to go into overtime, they might not have witnessed their parent team, Garber's Gorillas, show Rutgers fans that UMass is not just another institute of higher learning.

While most lacrosse fans bathed on the keg-infested hillsides of Curry Hicks Cliff watching the varsity show, the Chimps managed to derail the Prep-express from Naval Academy to the tune of 9-8.

Greg McKinney, not to be confused with Goalie Ray McKinney, won the game for his brother and fellow teammates (not to mention Coach Pete Connelly) by grabbing his own rebound of a shot (initially saved by Naval Academy goalie Jim Williamson) and tossing it into the strings. Score — UMass-9 Naval Academy-8. Left on the clock — 1 minute 27 seconds.

Ironically, the Gorillas grabbed a victory from the Scarlet Knights by scoring with under two minutes to play in their game also.

But returning to the matter at hand, the Chimps victory, their second straight of their young season, climaxed an uphill battle which saw (1) the score tied five separate times, not including 0-0; (2) UMass only down once, at 2-1; (3) some unbelievable saves by both goalies and (4) four power play goals by the Academy, keeping them in the game.

Ray McKinney was tested early by the Academy-men, and came up with two first minute saves. At the 75 second mark of the opening quarter, Steve Colella put the UMass squad up 1-zip with his unassisted goal.

It didn't last long though as Preppie Rich Naslorski evened it up only 38 seconds later when he dumped in a goal, crossing in front of the UM-net. Adding insult to injury, he put his team up 2-1 exactly one minute later, shooting a shot off UMass goalie McKinney's back, to the surprise of many.

In the next three minutes, the little Red Machine rattled in a trio of goals, a singleton by Carl Leone and a pair by Tim Kallmerten, moving the Chimps up 4-2.

But the Cadets would not be shipped out to the Bermuda Triangle. Their goalie Williamson was hot. He stopped a Leone shot rifled from in close, and a Mike Garifalo bid was halted in the early goings of the second period.

The game was following a pattern: UMass' Chimps were firing shots-with Williamson making the necessary saves. And when N.A. would get a shot on UM's goal (they had good chances for easy goals and would whistle 'em high or wide), McKinney'd find his way in front of the hard rubber object (a couple of shoulder saves, and one kick save with his foot-the ball settling six inches from the goal line).

completely effective job of denying the high-scoring Rutgers attackmen the ball, to the extent of defenseman Ament commenting that he thought the Rutgers attack was overrated. Actually though it seems the UMass defense corps, usually lost in the shadow of a high-powered offense, was underrated.

In a quick fill-in role, defenseman Coe played under a lot of pressure for the first time this season and the result was overwhelmingly favorable. Donovan, one of the usual full time Gorilla defensemen sprained his ankle while tightly covering a Scarlet Knight attacker and probably will not see action again until the North Carolina home game a week from Friday.

Attackman John Reardon's two goals came as no surprise to Garber who expects many more good things from the freshman attacker. According to Garber, Reardon's good attitude enables him to be a most valuable asset to this talent-filled squad where individuals have certain jobs that when performed effectively make the team the kind of successful entity it was on last Saturday.

"Eighteen to 20 guys contribute," said Garber, "that is the way to get the job done. It is a lot of guys doing a lot of little things."

As UMass neatly passed away the waning seconds of Saturday's game inside the regulation restraining lines all of those little things seemed to come together.

The little things all came together for one big thing. The most important victory of the season thus far for the UMass lacross team.

Gazelles fight back; tie Huskies, 9-9

By JIM GLEASON
Collegian Staff

The UMass women's lacrosse team, led by freshman Julie Hall's five goals, fought back from a 6-1 deficit to tie a tough Northeastern team, 9-9, Saturday afternoon at NOPE.

With UMass trailing 6-1, Hall scored four of the team's next six goals to help put the Gazelles ahead, 7-6. The teams played evenly for the remainder of the game and the score ended in a tie.

Northeastern took the opening faceoff and quickly led 2-0 before Hall answered for UMass. The visiting team, with balanced scoring, then ran off four straight goals to make the score 6-1.

Before halftime, the Gazelles scored three goals to close the gap to 6-4. They carried the momentum into the second half and ran off three more straight goals to take the lead.

The game seesawed with both teams creating good opportunities on offense. It appeared that Northeastern might walk away with a win as it held a 9-8 lead in the final minutes. But Judy Kennedy scored on a pass from Nancy O'Neil for the final score of the day.

The UMass offense applied good pressure for the remainder of the game but couldn't score.

UMass coach Frank Garahan was pleased with the outcome. "Considering it was our first game, I thought we did well. We were visibly nervous in the beginning which helped them to jump into the lead. You know, it was the first game ever for a lot of our players," he said.

"We were missing many of our defensive assignments in the first half and their defense played aggressively, but we came back."

The goaltending duty for UMass was split between Mary Murray (first half) and Robin Jennings (second half), and both came up with some fine saves.

Besides Hall's five goals, Kennedy, C. Nickerson, Evie Sneeden, and O'Neil also scored for UMass.

Today UMass plays at Smith at 4:00 and Garahan expects another close game.

Oarswomen fall in 1st meet; Holyoke prevails in close race

By LISA MELILLI
Collegian Staff

The UMass women's varsity crew team lost by eight seconds to a strong Mount Holyoke crew in a close and unusually long race Saturday on the Connecticut River.

After a strong start, UMass edged its way past Holyoke. But by the 500 meter line, Holyoke had taken over with a strong lead which they kept to the end of the 1500 meter race.

The race ran for eight minutes, which is unusual in women's crew. Most courses in women's crew take five minutes to complete. However, because of strong water currents, the race ran for eight minutes.

According to Doug Frost, oarswomen coach, UMass put up a good fight but its problem was in the amount of the strokes it did per minute in the race.

"Because of the length of the race, it was more advantageous to use fewer strokes so that more strength and power could be put behind each stroke and the strength of the crew would not be exhausted before the end of the race," said Frost.

"While Holyoke was doing 30 strokes per minute, we were pushing 32 and 34 and frazzled while Holyoke was going strong and smooth."

This was the first race in Holyoke's history, since they started a squad last fall. "I didn't really know what to expect from them," said Frost, "but I did have a feeling that they were a hidden powerhouse."

Coxswain of the varsity boat, Faye Blumenthal, who is a junior business major, said she was happier that the squad lost in an early race instead of later on in the season.

"It's better now than in the more important races later on in the season. We rowed a good race this weekend and can get even better," she said.

The most important meet of the season will be this Saturday at Syracuse against Syracuse and Penn. Frost said the two teams have just as much if not more strength than Holyoke.

"It's clear from this race with Holyoke that we'll have some work to do before we meet Syracuse and Penn and luckily from this race we can see in what areas we need the most practice," said Frost.

This was the second race in UMass' varsity team history, having defeated Brown two weeks ago at its opponents' home base.

The junior varsity also lost Saturday, running an 8:45 race, 20 seconds behind a Holyoke junior varsity and novice boat finish. UMass took a slow start with the two Holyoke boats taking an easy lead at the beginning of the race which they kept to the end.

Frost said the problem again was with the strong current and the length of the race. "We took more strokes than they and frazzled. Holyoke had the advantage again," he said.

Trinity trims crewmen in a close regatta

By BILL CARRINGTON
Collegian Staff

The UMass men's varsity crew lost a close race to Trinity Saturday at the Mason-Downs Cup Regatta on Trinity's home course in Hartford.

Competing in the regatta were UMass, Trinity, and the University of Rhode Island. Conditions of choppy water, strong current, and a headwind made for a long race. Trinity's winning time was 7:44.

The race for the Mason-Downs Cup, the heavyweight varsity race, was hoped to be UMass' redemption, as Trinity and URI had won all previous races.

UMass got off to a good start, pulling away from Trinity by one-half of a boat length. URI never quite got in the race, as it trailed UMass and Trinity from the start. Trinity began moving back, overstroking UMass by three strokes per minute throughout the body of the race.

Trinity rowed at a 36, UMass rowed at a 33. Trinity drew even with UMass at the 1,000 meter mark of the 2,000 meter race. UMass attempted to halt Trinity's drive by taking 20 power strokes. It worked, as Trinity could get no more, but only temporarily.

As soon as UMass had finished its power strokes, Trinity took its power 20 which carried its length into the lead. It could get no more, and UMass pressed Trinity through the remainder of the race. At the sprint for the finish, UMass closed in to within one-half of a length, but the race ended too soon.

Although UMass was defeated, one bright note is the margin of victory. Trinity is consistently one of the finalists in the Dad Vail Championships, frequently one of the top three finishers. The distance between both boats at the finish of this race would indicate that UMass has the speed to make the finals at the championships.

UMass will meet Trinity twice again before the season is over, at the Worcester Invitational Regatta and at the Dad Vail Championships. UMass will be rowing longer practice pieces in an effort to make up the difference and catch Trinity in future races.

was 11:26.4 while Swartz finished at 11:27.

Other finishes were Barbara Callahan — fifth — women's mile, Chris Perron — second and Ginger Bulman — fifth, women's intermediate hurdles, Cindy Martin — third — women's 440, and Gail Edmond — fifth — women's javelin.

Three seconds and two thirds highlighted the women's relays as runnerup finishes were recorded in the women's 440 relay, distance medley and mile relays, while thiid spots were accomplished in the sprint medley and two mile.

Relays attract top NE talent for UM meet

By MIKE BERGER
Collegian Staff

For one Saturday, UMass and Derby Track were the center of New England Track as 1200 men and women particpants took part in the second annual UMass Relays. An estimated 60 teams from all over New England and New York competed in 32 track and field and relay events which stretched from 10 a.m. to 5:45 p.m.

"I am very happy with the way the whole meet went," said UMass head coach and meet coordinator Ken O'Brien.

"When you have that many people competing and so many events scheduled, you need great organization, planning, and efficient track officials. Most of the visiting coaches were amazed how a meet of such magnitude could go off. It was a tribute to all officials, timers and anybody else who helped make this meet such a big success," said O'Brien.

An estimated 1500 spectators, on a partly cloudy 71 degree day, saw one Derby track record broken, another tied by two Boston College and one Northeastern trackmen. Byron Hemingway, a 6'4" 209-lb. Eagle defensive end, tied the 120 high hurdles record by winning the event at 14.0 while teammate Phil Hazard blasted to a wind-aided, 9.4 100 yd. dash record-breaking, victory.

Northeastern jumper Ron Chambers came up with a pair of record breaking performances in the long and triple jumps. Chambers established a new Derby Track record by winning the long jump at 24'-4¼" and then completed the double record by capturing the triple jump at 49'7.

UMass, both men and women, had its share of outstanding individuals and relays as four out six relays saw UMass place second while the women had three seconds and two thirds.

Individually, sophomore Kevin McCusker broke away from Division III and All-American 3000 steeplechaser Mark Duggan to win the event at 9:13.8. McCusker, running the equivalent of two miles, surpassed 12 laps of two water jumps and two hurdles each lap to easily win his first 3000 steeplechase.

A couple of underclassmen broke into the finals category as freshman Jeff King tied the freshman half-mile record with a fourth place finish of 1:54 while sophomore Rich Hoag won his first qualifying heat at 23.2 and then came back to place third at 22.9 in the 220 final.

Senior All-American runner John McGrail ran competively with Providence a couple of other All-Americans, UMass graduate and now Greater Boston Track Club runner Randy Thomas and Providence All-American Mick O'Shea, before falling back to third place with a time of 14:20 in the men's seeded 5000 meters.

Thomas was right on O'Shea's tail-running stride for stride-before O'Shea sprinted past Thomas in the final lap to post the victory at 14:04.5.

Probably the most exciting relay races of the day were the two mile and mile relays which saw UMass being just nipped by a matter of inches in both races by rival Boston College.

In both races O'Brien used Mark Healy, John Richards, Jim Hunt and Joe Martens. In the two mile, Healy (1.58) opening up the relay, fell behind by 20 yards before Joe Martens erased the deficit to 10 during his first half mile, timed at 1:55. Junior John Richards passed the third BC runner with a 1:57 time and the rest was passed on to senior co-captain half miler Jim Hunt.

It was only fitting that the same unit would return for the last event of the day — the mile relay. Hunt, leading off the race, ran fourth as he passed the baton over to Mark Healy, who passed two other runners in gaining second place.

Richards, running a 49 second quarter, gained first place in the third by overtaking the BC runner and gave anchor leg junior Joe Martens the advantage by 10-yards. Eagle sprinter Phil Hazard, who earlier had broken the 100-yard dash record, caught up to Martens at the 330 mark and just turned on the jets in winning the relay at 3.18.7 while UMass finished with a 3:19.1.

Hazard ran a 48.2 quarter while Martens ran his anchor 440 at 48.8.

The women equally had a respectable showing as 10 trackwomen reached the final events and placed. Dianne Sealey and Nancy Cominoli each won their events as Sealey won the 440 with a time of 60.7 while Cominelli won the 100-meter hurdles with a 15.2 clocking.

In the women's 880, Julie Lafreniere placed third at 2:18.3, only 10 seconds behind the number one women's miler in the world and Olympic finalist Jan Merrill. Merrill won the evnnt at 2:08. Jane Welzel and Sue Swartz ran fourth and fifth in the women's two-mile with one second separating the two. Welzel

Batsmen drop two of three

By FRAN SYPEK
Collegian Staff

After yesterday's 7-6, 10-inning loss to AIC, UMass baseball coach Dick Bergquist just sat at the edge of the home dugout at Lorden Field with a look of disbelief on his face.

"We've now lost eight ball games by one run and four others by two runs," lamented Bergquist.

Two of those one-run losses came this past weekend as the Minutemen split a doubleheader with New Hampshire Saturday in Durham, losing the first game 5-4 and winning the nightcap 9-5 on Mike McEvilly's grand slam homer in the seventh inning. Yesterday the Minutemen appeared to have the game won with a 5-3 going into the ninth, but Andy Zajac blasted a two-out, three-run homer to put the visitors up by one run.

Neal Lojek, who replaced Bob Alves in left field during the top of the inning, lead off the ninth with a home run to left field to knot the score of six. However, AIC first baseman Bruce Cluett led off the 10th inning with a single, reached third on a throwing error and scored the winning run when shortstop Jim Cullen had trouble with Chris Olinski's ground ball.

Dave Tewhill, who replaced starter Chris Kirby in the eighth, was the losing pitcher. Jim Mazzer, who came on in relief of Ken Bourque in the sixth, received credit for the victory.

The Minutemen came up with eight runs in the final two innings of Saturday's second game to earn a split with the Wildcats. A three-run homer by John Czerapowicz and an RBI double by Cullen tied the score at 5-5 in the sixth and McEvilly's bases loaded blast won the game in the seventh. Tewhill, who relieved starter Doug Welenc in the fifth, got the win.

In the first game, Steve Wholley hit a two-run homer in the first inning and drove in the winning run in the sixth with a base hit to lead the Wildcats to a 5-4 win. Jeff Reardon was the starter and loser for the Minutemen.

AIC jumped out to a quick 2-0 lead in the first inning of yesterday's game and added another run in the fourth on Bill Cornetta's triple. Dale Stone and Ed Skribiski each drove in runs as the Minutemen came up with single runs in the fourth and fifth.

UMass took the lead in the seventh. Pinch-hitter Leo Kalinowski led off the inning with a triple to right field and came home on Skribiski's RBI single. Paul Abramowicz followed with a base hit and both runners advanced on Alves' sacrifice bunt. Czerapowicz was intentionally walked to load the bases before Stone drove in his second run of the game on a ground out. Abramowicz came across with the final run of the frame on Cullen's infield single.

But Tewhill couldn't hold the lead as the Minutemen suffered their 13th loss against nine wins. UMass outhit AIC, 13-10.

The batsmen will be hoping to rebound from their recent frustrations this afternoon when they host Dartmouth in a doubleheader beginning at 1:00. Tom Nigro will hurl the first game. Bergquist hasn't decided on his second game pitcher, but said that it will be either Dave Stoller or Jerry Erb.

"Dartmouth's a much better club this year than they were last year, said Bergquist. A year ago, the Minutemen took a pair from the Big Green, winning 7-2 and 6-1.

Win streak at five

Gorillas trounce Eagles

By TOM CROWLEY
Collegian Staff

As spring has finally gotten to Amherst, the UMass lacrosse team bloomed this weekend, beating nationally ranked Rutgers 12-11 Saturday, on a last second Mike Lettera goal and zonked Boston College yesterday, 16-5. The home wins raised Garber's Gorilla's record to 5-2.

The stick men didn't get rolling until the second half yesterday when they outscored the Eagles, 11-3.

The Minutemen led 3-1 at the end of one quarter, led by three at half, 5-2. The Gorillas outscored BC 5-1 in the third period and the substitutes kept the pace up in the final frame by scoring six goals and allowing two.

The Gorillas did not start out sharp and at one point in second period, were up only 3-2.

"We were not slipping, we were beat up and sore," coach Dick Garber said after the game. "We were hurting from Saturday's game. Jeff Spooner, Steve Pappas, Micky Menna, and Steve Patterson were all bruised from Rutgers."

Rich Donovan, a starting defender, sprained his ankle in the Rutgers game and was replaced by Roger Cowe.

"Roger Coe did a good job for Donovan," Garber said. The second team was sharp and played excellently."

The defense stopped Ward Bitter, the nation's leading goal scorer, but the BC attackman still got four goals, all off of broken plays and bad UMass passes. Bitter's teammate Wally Cox, the nation's fourth highest goal scorer was held to one goal and no other Eagle tallied a point.

Garber figured that the two team's mental states had an influenced on the outcome. "We were emotionally drained from Saturday's game. We tried hard but we weren't sharp. We were beatup.

"For BC this is a big rivalry. For them to knock us off is what they shoot for."

BC's hope of upsetting UMass were killed by themselves as Don Goldstrein was forced into making only seven saves and Jeff Cohen three. Mike Gillis, the eagle netminder, had 22 stops.

UMass dominated the ball, particularly in the second half, and took 68 shots. BC could only manage 27 attempts.

Spooner continued his productive weekend by leading the team in scoring with three goals and five assists. Norm Smith and Pappas both scored a hat trick, but Smith had two assists to Pappas' one. Mike Gongas scored two fourth period goals for his points.

Patterson and Menna were quiet during the game. Menna had a goal and two assists while Patterson had one of each. Patterson was the target of special converage by BC and received numerous butt ends during the game. Both players were not as sharp as Saturday.

John O'Brien scored a goal and an assist, while Dave Martin and Terry Keefe both put points on the board once.

Mike Lewis, Dave Lautman, and Randy Krutzler all had an assist.

The next game for the Minutemen is this Saturday when the team will play the Ephmen of Williams College at home at 2 p.m.

Batswomen win fourth straight game

By MEL WEBSTER
Collegian Staff

The UMass softball team won its fourth game in a row Saturday as it defeated Keene State, 4-1, in a game played at NOPE Field.

The Minutewomen, now 4-0, received a strong pitching performance from co-captain Gail Matthews. Matthews allowed only five hits while striking out four Keene batters en route to her second victory against no defeats.

The visitors got on the scoreboard first. Third baseman Joanne Little singled and advanced to second when the ball was misplayed, and then scored on a single by Donna Bunnell who had three hits for the Owls.

The Minutewomen came right back to take the lead in the bottom of the third inning. Carol Bruce tripled to right field with two outs, and scored on a single by Susan DiRocco who scored herself when the throw back into the infield went into left field.

The lead was increased to 3-1 in the fifth inning when Heidi Dickson singled to left, was sacrified to second by Cheryl Meliones, went to third on a groundout, and scored on a wild pitch.

The only other time besides the third inning that Matthews was in trouble was in the sixth. The first two Keene batters singled, and then after two flyouts to Sue Peters in left, a third Keene batter reached base on an error. Matthews worked out of the jam by getting the next Keene batter to foul out to Peters.

Peters singled sharply to center for the Minutewomen with one out in the sixth. She stole second and scored on a single to right by Rhonda McManus, (two hits), making the score 4-1 in favor of UMass.

Matthews then breezed through the seventh, striking out the last Keene batter she faced. "I really wanted that last batter," Matthews said.

Coach Dianne Thompson was pleased with the baserunning of her team (three stolen bases). She said that the women "still have to work on their hitting."

Thompson said that this game was a tight one because it is rumored that Keene and UMass are two of the best teams in the region.

Despite the fact that the hitting was still sparse, Thompson was pleased with the way that her team was making the Keene pitcher work by picking out the good pitches.

The Minutewomen take on Westfield State this afternoon at 2:30 in a doubleheader at NOPE Field. The Owls defeated UMass last year by a score of 10-8, but this year their record is only 1-6.

Coach Thompson feels this record may be deceiving, however, as Westfield held a 3-0 lead over Springfield before losing the game in the late innings. Both teams have played Central Connecticut, with UMass sweeping it, and Westfield being beaten badly by Central in a doubleheader.

Thompson will start Peters and Gail Carter against Westfield saving Matthews for the Springfield game on Thursday.

ON THE BASES — Matthews' ERA after two games is a sparkling 1.00 ... The junior varsity lost to Keene, 7-4, in eight innings Saturday ... The fourth victory by the varsity equals its total of last year.

Gorillas rise to occasion

By BEN CASWELL
Collegian Staff

"It was a team effort," said jubilant UMass lacrosse midfielder Mike Lettera. "It was a together win," continued the game-winning goal scorer."

One minute and 48 seconds earlier Lettera had scored his second goal in a row, his third of the game, and put into the record books a completely thrilling 12-11 victory for the UMass lacrosse team over the Scarlet Knights of Rutgers University.

"This is certainly one of the biggest wins we've ever had," said the always smiling UMass lacrosse coach Dick Garber, smiling more than ever after his team's hard-earned win over the seventh ranked major college lacrosse team in the nation.

"When we win one like that," Garber went on, "then we know we can play with anyone." To play with anyone might be an understatement, to beat anyone might be more appropriate for this UMass lacrosse team which with few exceptions has had a history of "coming together" for the big efforts needed to be victorious against some of the best lacrosse competition in the nation.

A classic one-goal contest was what the UMass-Rutgers battle represented on Saturday. UMass never led by more than one goal and it did so only four times including the game-winning score. Rutgers University had the biggest lead of the day (two goals) midway through the third period. Other than that this game was more tightly contested than any game UMass has played in since its one goal victory over Brown University for the New England major college lacrosse championship three years ago.

In order to win against a team with the lacrosse-laden ability of Rutgers, Garber's Gorillas knew that they would have to play a total game as a team. This effort against Rutgers University even exceeded the total game concept and went beyond to something more that each individual team member had to pull out from within himself to keep UMass close to the Scarlet Knights and its eventual national-rating boosting win.

The UMass lacrosse team was led in scoring on the day by attackman Jeff Spooner, who assisted on seven goals and scored one of his own. Spooner played the game with a painful pulled groin which did not seem to hamper his movements in the least.

Lettera, coming off a leg injury of his own, had three goals, the last two the tying and winning goals, to spark the Gorillas to victory. Lettera's all-out style of play also sparked the Gorillas all throughout the game.

Attackman Micky Menna seemed to be everywhere at once all through the game and finished with a - none - too - paltry three goals and two assists of his own. It was Menna's smacking of Rutgers defenseman Rex Capro, who played superbly all day himself, and forcing Capro's downfield pass to go out of bounds that set-up UMass' ball control to lead up to the winning goal.

On defense picture-perfect UMass defenseman Wayne Ament, with the strong and able assistance of Ken Michaud, Roger Coe and Richie Donovan (until he sprained his ankle) kept the high-scoring Rutgers attack in tight check all day.

Strategically on defense coach Garber had a set plan in mind for the likes of Tom Sweeney and Bob Olsen, two of the top ten scorers in the nation.

"We hoped to shut off their attack by playing a tight coverage all of the time," said Garber. "We wanted to deny their attack the ball." The Gorillas defense did a

VOLUME III ISSUE 9

On The Liberation Front

By AKBAR MUHAMMAD AHMED

While many historians negate the influence of black nationalism within the black community, black nationalism has been the underlying ideology within black America since the 1800's, emerging in different periods, the main period being the 1920's creating the only mass movement of black people in America, involving millions in the Garvey movement.

When the nationalist tide rises,the theory of the charismatic leader is produced and becomes the philosophy of the masses of our people during that time. But after the destruction of the movement, the nationalist philosophy becomes just a memory because the ideology of the nationalist leader is not theorized in a historical setting. The failure of black people in America to form a dynamic and continuous nationalist movement has been because nationalist discontinuity occurs as a result of the state's oppression of any mass nationalist movement. This nationalist discontinuity exists also because Negro intellectuals in the past shied away from revolutionary, nationalist ideology and movements. Thus, once a particular nationalist movement is crushed, discontinuity occurs in the black community's ranks, creating a nationalist vacuum waiting to be fulfilled by the next charismatic leader that comes along.

Black nationalist circles remained dormant after the destruction of the Garvey movement. It resurged for a brief period in the 1940's. While the petty black bourgeoisie adopted the philosophy of integration, the masses had the ideology of black nationalism. Even the black bourgeoisie would admit that the philosophy of black nationalism had remained latent among our people. In the 1950's black nationalism began to recover under the leadership of the Honorable Elijah Muhammad and the Nation of Islam. Mr. Muhammad introduced Islam into black nationalism and developed a religious consciousness for the ideology.

This religious consciousness had a lot to do with future development because it provided the black community with a clear historical and religious sense of destiny. It gave rise to the expectations of a mass nationalist consciousness and movement. The Nation of Islam kept the continuity of black nationalism going in the black community for a forty-year period. It soon was the best organized of black nationalist groups, being unique in its religious approach. Revolutionary black nationalism is not a new ideology for it has developed from the historical roots of Henry Highland Garnet, David Walker, Denmark Vesey, Martin Delaney, the Garvey movement, DuBois' Pan African congresses and the Nation of Islam. Revolutionary black nationalism is a root ideology using the historical experiences and philosophies of black nationalist leaders of the past and present and combining them with the tactics and revolutionary ideology of other revolutionary movements.

Malcom X is the transitional figure in the development of revolutionary black nationalism. From his speeches and writings come the foundation of the ideology.

While this essay does not deal with much of Malcolm's content, it does try to provide insight into some of Malcolm's organizational plans. Though Malcolm's organization, the OAAU (Organization of Afro-American Unity), never became an action center for the black revolution, part of its program was adopted by younger revolutionaries who are now making today's headlines. Revolutionary black nationalism still very much stands undefined. It is the philosophy that is being produced by the black revolution in America. It becomes internationalism — or Pan-African — when reflecting on the international aspects of the process of decolonization.

Today, African peoples in every country are witnessing a new racial awakening. Black consciousness is rising each day. Black nationalism, the ideology of Black Power and Pan Africanism and the international expression of black nationalism are developing mass followings.

The Black Power Movement in America is still relatively young. The white power structure, realizing what the Black Power philosophy would mean once our people digested it, moved to crush the movement. Black nationalists were soon hit with mass conspiracy cases. 1967 found H. Rap Brown, Huey Newton, Imamu Amiri Baraka (LeRoi Jones), myself and a number of other brothers in jail. These jailings were part of a white power conspiracy to crush the emerging Black Power Movement. The power structure could not have assassinated Dr. Martin Luther King when they did if these brothers and others had been on the streets during '67 and '68 because the brothers would have had sizable followings (if not an army), and couldhave mobilized the millions of our people.

KING'S ASSASSINATION AND AFTERMATH

After King's assassination, the power structure moved through its fifth column — the Ford Foundation and the white American left. The Ford, other foundations, and local banks attempted to buy off the Black Power leadership. C.O.R.E. was almost completely usurped. In Philadelphia, the black nationalist leadership split into factions; fighting over a measly million dollars during the black coalition conspiracy. It was at that time that the movement suffered serious setbacks. Bourgeois "Black Power" spokesmen, all of a sudden, began to crop up with powerful white financial backings. They traveled under the garb of cultural nationalism. These new house niggers were sanctioned by the "man" to keep the masses confused through black cultural rhetoric.

Mysticism became a way of life for many young brothers and sisters. This new form of escapism was propagated to keep black youth from becoming revolutionary black nationalists and forming a Black Revolutionary Party and Liberation Army (Black Guard). On the other hand, brothers who romanticized black revolution on the West Coast, made some serious mistakes. We must realize that revolutions are not made over television, radio, or through the enemies' press. A revolutionary never warns the enemy of what he is going to do; he does it.

The year 1970 opened up a new decade for the universal African. The question for the African captive in America is: How should we proceed to nation building? In order the answer that question we must first analyze the alternatives that are being presented to us.

THE DRIVE FOR LEGAL BLACK POLITICAL POWER

The movement toward running black candidates for public office, utilizing the bloc vote, represents the last legal stage of the black middle-class interest in the capitalist political system. It is a continuation from post Civil War days; when the black middle-class obtained a degree of political power in the South. The attempt to achieve political equality has been the main emphasis of our national democratic revolution. While this drive doesn't totally serve the interests of the black working class — the vast majority of our people — it will help to exhaust the legal means of protest, and eliminate the illusions that black people can achieve freedom in the capitalist system. At the same time, this drive helps weaken the political system by polarizing its inherent contradictions.

Full black political representation will thrown American into political chaos. But it should be remembered that the enemy has plans of just changing faces with the game remaining the same. The enemy will let black people control the political machinery of the cities, while he still controls the industry. The enemy plans to establish neo-colonialism in America as he has done in many other places in Africa and Asia. Because we are in a national democratic revolution, black revolutionaries must support the drive of the black middle-class to get legal black political power. We must do this because the drive heightens the political and nationalist consciousness of the black working class, organizes them in political organization and polarizes contradictions within the colonializer's system. At the same time that we organize to get black political representation within the system, we must constantly teach the people, that this will not get them liberation.

THE DRIVE FOR LEGAL BLACK ECONOMIC POWER

While most black revolutionaries criticize black capitalism as being a hoax — that it will not benefit most of our people — we must still support the black middle-class drie to become a capitalist class. We do this not because we feel black people can gain freedom under the capitalist system, or that black capitalists are any better than white capitalists. We are in a nationalist revolution of a colonialized nation

Jamaican Migrants: Victims of Capitalism

by NUMMO NEWS SERVICE

In order to understand why Jamaicans are hired to pick Tobacco in North Carolina and the state of Massachusetts one needs to know the advantages. They are hired for one sole reason which is cheap labor.

Farmers in the U.S.A. were in somewhat of a fix. The Government in 1943 started sending out small flyers and ads in Newspapers notifying Jamaicans that jobs were available for them.

The first group to come came voluntarily, the second group was recruited. The ads are fill in blanks, little information is necessary. The ads only require that men be no older than twenty five. Once the men reach the labor camp they are given a complete army physical, if they are not physically fit they are sent back.

The Government pays for the passage of the workers but they must pay this back. In 1946 the average wage was 55 cents an hour. The workers are not citizens of the U.S. so they are not covered by the minimum wage law. Twenty five per cent of their pay is sent back to their families. In 1949 they payed $6.00 to $7.00 a week for room and board. Each farmer has his own camp, the building are like old army barracks, they contain an average of 48 beds depending upon the size of the camps.

The workers come by boat, most of them, approximately 3,000 people are aboard at a time. The first boat was called the starvation boat by the workers.

The ads are essentially contracts for one years work, if workers wish to renew their contract they must do so at the end of that year or they are sent back. Some men do not renew because they miss their families, which in most cases is the reason most of them signed on to work, so that they could earn enough money to feed their families. The average family size is six to eight members.

They have to work 6 days a week in most camps, Sunday is a rest day, in most camp religious ceremonies are held on Sunday.

If someone wants to leave camp they must have a permit from the Camp Manager. They are required to be back in camp by 6 a.m. the following morning. If someone wants to visit a camp he-she must pick up a permit from the Manager. No ladies are allowed in the barracks they are only permitted in the visiting rooms.

The rules are not the same in all camps because they are subject to the approval or disapproval of camp Managers.

No camp permits gambling, fighting, or women. These can result in termination of contract,

If a worker is a trouble maker he is often times beaten up by his fellow workers for they know if they do not control him he can make things hard on them all, some farmers encourage them to do this.

If workers are caught fighting they can be either deported or fined or sent to another camp, in most cases they are either fined or sent to another camp that way the government doesn't lose a worker.

The Managers work for the Government, it is their job to pick the workers up and take them to the camps and regulate their movement through regulations that he sees fit. He has Officers under him that regulate the work in the fields. It is their job to see that things run properly in the fields.

The workers do not get sick days, they can however work anytime that they please, but Managers do not tolerate any lofers. The camps are required to have a doctor and nurse present at all times, the government requires this. What goes on in most camps is that a doctor makes a visit to camps once or twice a month.

The camps have no education facilities on the grounds. The only way for workers to get schooling is through the mail. The farmers will now allow schooling on the property in most cases, the primary reason why they do this is to keep the Jamaican in the dark about what he can do to better himself.

Salesmen come to camps on weekends and paydays, they have to have a permit from camp managers to sell their goods. Their goods are of high quality but are expensive. There are possibilities for workers to earn extra money by doing piece work.

Today the workers earn $1.50 an hour tops but everything else has increased at a greater proportion. They have to pay more for rent, the fare has increased, and if they get sick they have to pay their own medical bills.

Some workers have been in camps for long periods of time know how to become U.S. Citizens. Most of them do exactly that become American Citizens. It is not easy for them to do this, they must have at least $500.00 saved to insure that the government will not be liable to support them, or they can get someone to sponsor them, or they can marry an American Citizen. This is the only way for them to get out of the contract arrangement and demand higher wages and stop being exploited by the farmers.

CONGOLESE PRESIDENT ASSASSINATED

While reports of the so-called invasion of Zaire, formerly the Democratic Republic of Congo, continued to make front-page news last week, news of the slaying of Marien Ngouabi, President of the neighboring Congo Republic (Brazsaville) was reported from Kinshasa.

The slaying was reportedly part of an attempted coup to topple Ngouabi's regime. However, the situation remains confused. The Congo has closed its borders, has introduced a curfew in the capital and has taken moves to forbid any meeting of more than five people. Meanwhile an 11-member committee has been formed to "prepare the funeral the safeguard the security of the people for which the president died."

National Black Organizer's Conference

BRO. AKBAR MUHAMMED AHMED delivers opening address at conference last Friday night.

Friday April 15
Opening Remarks:

The political and economical rights gained in the 1960's have swindled, black people are slipping back into the conditions of the post reconstruction era. The rights attained because of the deaths of great men like Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. and Malcolm X were reforms of the document that is supposed to guarantee equal rights for all men were spaced out when the Nixon Administration came to power. No one's freedom is guaranteed in order for black people to have full economical and political rights we have to continue to fight those who would reduce the black race to a state of indentured servitude.

Bro. BILL STRICKLAND speaks on the present condition of Black People.

The Present Condition of Black People in the United States: Prof. Bill Strickland

Unemployment is at a staggering 9 per cent what this means is 9 million people are unable to find work, the majority of which are black. The prison systems in America are loaded with black men who are the victims of the economic crises in America which politicians are trying to ignore away because there is nothing that they can do about it. Black people voted overwhelmingly for James Earl Carter. He represented the progressive white in the minds of those who voted him in. President Carter has not lived up to his promise. In fact, he is conservative on spending money to create jobs. Blacks in America today unemployed imprisoned. Black children are miseducated regardless if or not they go to an integrated or segregated schools must awaken to the harsh reality that nothing comes free if black people are to be free we must fight for it.

THE PURPOSE OF THE BLACK ORGANIZERS CONFERENCE

Black people in the 1970's are faced with severe contradictions. What are some of these contradictions? They are, mass unemployment. Some 25 per cent or more of the black community is unemployed. The great majority of black people forced to live in inner city ghettos, live in sub-standard high rent houses. Black school children, those not bused into white schools, have to attend schools with inadequate facilities and worst of all are forced to be miseducated.

Our communities are flooded with drugs. Racist and politically reactionary police have made an axis with drug pushers, as they get kickbacks and are paid off through the drug culture. Black on black crime is reinforced, as a Negro mafia has willingly served the police as agents against social change and have become the C.I.A. connection in the black community. Black youth faced with unemployment turn more and more to crime as the only means of economic survival. As a result, jails and prisons across the country are now 80 per cent black.

Facist police frame black people by the hundreds every year to get them off the streets and have secretly entered into an alliance with right wing groups like the KKK and the minutemen in their over-kill plan to terrorize the young generation. This plan like operation phoenix used in Vietnam, is designed to immobilize black youth into fearing, fearing the power of the capitalist state; to instill an atmosphere of cynicism, defeat, despair, hopelessness, and fear to rebel or engage in revolution.

On top of all this, as economic conditions become worse for all poor people in America and reaches sectors of the middle class, black people, whor are the largest oppressed nationality in the United States are beginning to realize that our leaders, the late Malcolm X and Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. were both assasinated by the United States Government. Also, with the revelation of the Cointel pro documents it becomes very clear that an agency of the U.S. government, the FBI committeed murder and other means of destruction against the Black Liberation movement. This is "Genocide", the scientific and systematic destruction of a people by a government.

Faced with these facts and the growing reality that the gains won for black people in the 1960's are rapidly being eliminated, we gather on April 15th-17th to analyze our past and present situation, to struggle against our past weakness as a social movement and to develop new strengths for the struggle ahead.

Our task before us is to unite as many in the black community as possible behind a scientific program, ideology, and organization for our common oppressor and enemy is increasing it's war of genocide and repression against us.

To all black people and allies, we call attention to this important weekend and say, the Struggle Continues.

Tiny Pryamids

This past weekend there was a theatre experience at Hampshire College: a musical-dance-poetry production called Tiny Pyramids. This play was the result of a collaboration between a Hampshire Student, Melinda Goodman and UMass writer, Sister Freida Jones. The show was divided into 4 parts. Parts 1 and 3, High School and Love Poems were the conception of Melinda Goodman. These sections were quite exciting due to dynamic effects such a car pulling up to the windows in front of the stage and kids piling out, running in to do a synchronized routine of the 'bus stop'. Poems about the high school experience were recited to the background of slides and improvisation scenes in the girls bathroom. There were some quite funny parts. "He was just an old flame in my ragged book of matches he went out with the tide.." was recited very rhythmically by Lauren Price in her nightclub scene.

Parts 2 and 4, 'First Fears' and 'Tiny Pyramids,' were the conceptions of Freida Jones. The poem, 'First Fears' recited in a way that was hysterically funny by Nikki Dees, who dealt with "swinging in first time on acid" into the Ivory Coast Discoteque, where, eventually, her "fears splintered, like glass"... this sequence ended up in a wild dance routine to Brick's Disco Dazz where finally, a cyclone whips up and fencers parley outside the theatre windows. On a more serious tone, the poet took you to the Harlem experience — to '409 Edgecombe Avenue'... where slides dealing with historical harlem were shown. Part 4 was highlighted by "The Music", a piece about an avant-garde jazz musician portrayed superbly by Chris Johnson, who also composed and performed a very fine saxophone solo between his lines. The show ended with a guitar composed and performed by Herman Hampton.

Fine Dance numbers were a plus to the show: choreographers were Nikki Dees and Paulina Bendana. Their talents were almost outshaded by the dancers themselves: Anne Dudley, Sue Fizer, Carlton Wilson, Willis Lopez, Lauren Price, Irvine Goldson, Ada Griffin. Most dancers doubled as actors - along with Anthony Crusor and Freida Jones. Some fine singing on "Blue Moon," and "In a Sentimental Mood" etc. was done by Porky (Leroy Blair), Eshu Elegba, Anne Dudley and Ada Griffin... backed musically by this dynamite team... Jody Cahn - flute, Andy Strasmich - flute, Paul Hastil - piano, Richard Eisen - piano, David Katz - bass. David Katz was musical director. Watch out for all these Top Talents in the Valley again!

History, Race and the Fox

HATTIE FOX: Historian, Musician and Poet

If you missed Prodfessor Hattie Fox last Tuesday, April 12, then you missed the most exciting, entertaining and interesting lecture imaginable.

Hattie Fox, teacher of public school children in the south Bronx, scholar, writer, artist, muscia n of six instruments and Virgo, among otherthhings, talked for two and one half hours, (nobody moved), on history and racism.

A highly politically, culturally and spiritually aware being, Professor Fox's lexture encompassed everything under the stars and solar system as well.

Beginning with Egypt, "Land of Blackskinned people who founded the city of Heliopeles", she traced the emergenceofp racism a;; the way to todays technologiaally advanced world."

"We've got to remember that we've forgotten the orbit of the sun, though Egypt knew it six thousand years ago.

According to Professor Fox, western civilization's distortion of history can be realixed in the writings of J.A. Rogers (Five Negro Presidents) and Famous men of Color.)

"Westen education is based on the distortion of science and phylosophy."

She spoke of racism as a certain colors meand ofeenslaving other colors.

"If you dictate the contril by a certain color then you automatically dictate what the release has got to be."

Later the versatile Professor Fox played drums, performed West African dances and melodies a nscontinued to thoroughly evoke the thought, beauty and evolution of her audience.

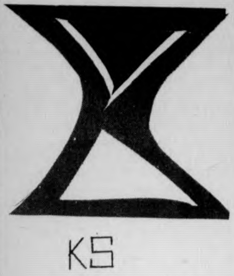
Spotlight on Diana Ramos

"Here Now"



Entire Ensemble in "Community Poem"

Halleluah! Great God Almighty

You don't always have to go to New York City to experience the most unique and innovative forms of modern ethnic dance. In some cases it's only a dorm or two away. Consider the basement of New Africa House, between 6-8pm. most any day of the week.

Here you can glimpse poetry in mostion, the kind that is only produced by the electrifying genius of choreography and dance, Diane Ramos.

Her class of modern interpretive dancing is a fusion of Black, African and modern dance. Diana makes her students aware of themselves physically, while her vigorous exercises serve to strengthen their muscles.

Though loud grunts and groans can be heard occasionally from her studio class, most students enjoy the class and the structure immensely.

"Her warmth takes the pain from the hurt", says Bilal Abdul-Haqq who attends her intermediate class this semester, "Diana not only knows how to get down, but how to talk to people as well".

The vibrant constantly expanding and creative personality spills into the choreography of Diana Ramos. She combines her interpretations.of Third World Life and culture, revolution and the sixties to create such pieces as "Great God Almighty", "Here Now", and "Community Poem".

Diana's performing company, comprised of advanced students, Third World Image Theatre/Ensemble has been performing these works all over the valley this spring.

Poet and member of the ensemble, Annie Carpenter speaks of her teacher's ability to capture the essence of the African roots, through which she is able to teach, lead, guide enhance the minds and bodies of her students.

Annie, inspirator of "Community Poem", a ritual improvisational movement feels, "Diana Ramos is a unique ray of light which shines beyond the norm of an everyday people into the realms of masterhood.

With her five years of teaching at UMass, Diana brings years of teaching Dance Experience.

The University of Massachusetts is fortunate to have an artist of Diana's caliber in their midst and should be wise enough to retain her presence.

It isn't often that a professor is so widely known and appreciated by students and faculty alike. Just talk to anyone who has taken Diana's class.

Bilingual Conference on Education

The National Association of Bilingual Educators sponsored an international conference on bilingual education in New Orleans, Louisiana. The NABE conference brought together a broad spectrum of people involved with issues related to bilingual and multicultural education. During the week long conference, strongly supported by Federal Government Title VII monies and several regional southern organizations who worked with NABE, bilingual and multicultural educators and administrators had an opportunity to share information about the condition and developments in bilingual education. Hundreds of pre-conference and conference presentations projected issues and reported on topics such as research, legal litigation, parent participation, cross-cultural community action, counseling, program and staff development, and concerns related to learning and teaching in a multi-lingual, multi-cultural society.

On Wednesday, April 6, Stephen R. Aiello, vice-president of the New York City Board of Education, was the keynote speaker at the first general session. He warned the audience of several hundred not to become complacent because bilingual education involved complex social, political, pedagogical and economic issues which will demand many years of struggle to resolve. He noted the importance of the Title VII legislation at the federal level but noted that only substantial quality research and consistent struggle would insure the future of bilingual programs. He pointed out that many important sectors of the United States population see bilingual education in the same light as the communist menace. He said that a November 22, 1977 editorial in the New York Times titled, "Bilingual Danger," expressed a fear that bilingualism will support separatist movements.

In another presentation, where a panel of representatives from the National Institute of Education discussed the role of federal involvement in issues and research relevant to bilingual education, Joshua Fishman told of a response he had written to the Times editorial which the Times had not yet published. "If Hispanic (or rather minority) 'divisiveness' increases in the USA," he said, "it will be because of the long tradition of English dominated inequality... rather than because of bilingual education..." Fishman also warned those concerned with bilingual and multi-cultural education to beware of their constraints, budgetary instability and political resistance. He discussed the importance of developing a knowledge base through research and told the group that monies will not be forthcoming because of the need of bilingual children but because of quality of their research and political strength.

Concern about the future of federal and state legislation and funding was a consistent theme throughout the week long conference. Symbolically the award for the most significant contribution to the struggle for bilingual education went to the Lau family, who had successfully won a case against the San Francisco Board of Education for failing to meet the educational needs of non-English speaking children. The Supreme Court decision on this case led to the creation of Lau Centers in regions of the country where there is significant need for assisting local school districts in preparing plans for bilingual education.

Workshops reflected the issues and concerns for Asian, Puerto Rican, Chicano, Native American, French, Italian and other linguistic minorities. Several presenters noted the importance of cross-cultural cooperation in local struggles for bilingual and multi-cultural education. In a workshop on "Bilingual Education and Desegregation" Judith Gaskin and Ricardo Fernandez pointed out that the court decisions were allowing people who were not Asian, Puerto Rican, Native American or Chicano to define linguistic and cultural needs. They described several cases where the concern for multi-lingual and multi-cultural education had created conflicts in communities attempting to implement court ordered desegregation. They suggested that local groups develop an understanding of the racial as well as linguistic and cultural dynamics of their community as they plan for programs.

The movement to incorporate bilingual and multi-cultural education as part of the national curriculum means many different things in different communities. Basically it reflects a concern for the delivery of quality education to children with linguistic and cultural needs beyond that of the standard English speaking population. The NABE conference demonstrated that there is a broad spectrum of social, political, economic and pedagogical concerns reflected by people attending the conference. The common denominator is stated as the future of the children. As the conference came to an end this reporter observed an interesting phenomena. The overwhelming issue in an increasing number of groupings became regional power in the election of officers for the NABE Board of Directors. Some of the politics were reminiscent of a Democratic or Republican Party nominating convention, with all of its attendant effects. This is a reflection of the tendency of professional associations to imitate the stronger groups (i.e. national parties) in the society. This tendency of professional associations to behave very similarly to other sectors in the society has historically meant that they also did not stimulate significant changes in their area of concern. In order to develop effective learning environments for bilingual children in a multi-cultural society the educators and administrators who take time to attend professional gatherings such as the NABE conference will have to consider the substance and structure of the organization which their participation creates, and how that affects the ultimate goals of the movement for bilingual education. The parents and children will hold educators, administrators and teachers accountable.

in which all classes must surge forth to obtain their national class interests as one class. Being suppressed, the black middle-class was not allowed to develop into a bourgeois class. Black capitalism is the last legalist drive by the black middle-class to obtain economic power within the system. It is important that we understand the dynamics of class, class structure, colonialism and national liberation movements. Our revolution is a national liberation revolution; it is one of a colonialized nation seeking independence and self-determination from the colonializer.

We must realize that there are antagonistic contradictions between all classes of black America and the colonializer. The black bourgeoisie, because it lacks political and economic power, is more of a petty bourgeoisie than bourgeoisie and will have more of a tendency to support the revolution than a classical bourgeoisie. If we understand these contradictions, then we will understand why the black middle-class responds the way that it does. Black revolutionaries must criticize the black middle-class drive toward black capitalism, but, at the same time, support it because we must realize that is is a necessary historical stage before our nation can move to open revolution.

In other words, we must support the existence and expanion of black businesses and at the same time we must point out that profits from black businesses should go back to the community. Black economic development must be a collective effort. Our colonialized nation needs an independent economic system. We need to be self-reliant. Black cooperatives must be encouraged. Black communalism, the joint ownership of the means of production and commerce by the community, must become a way of life. This is black economic self-determination: economic development that benefits the majority of our people. We must constantly teach our people that this is not totally possible without a complete social revolution. To develop a collective spirit and prepare our community for economic survival, we must develop economic cooperatives whenever we can.

CULTURAL REVOLUTION AND REVOLUTIONARY BLACK NATIONALISM

Since 1966, African people have been undergoing a cultural revolution. The cultural revolution has produced a pride in being of African stock. "Say it loud, I'm black and I'm proud" represents the present mood of thought. The honorable Elijah Muhammad, leader of the Nation of Islam is the spiritual father of the black cultural revolution in America. For some thirty years, the messenger has taught and propagandized our people with the importance of being self-reliant. The "Lamb" teaches us why we should separate and form an independent nation of our own. From the last Messenger of Allah came a mass spokesman who has given this generation of youth a new direction. Malcolm X and Muhammad Ali are two brothers who were personally groomed by the Messenger.

Many groups have cropped up to bring about a "re-Africanization" of our people. As a result, some of these groups have formed the position that all things come from culture. While revolutionary black nationalists seek black culture as a stage of development in the national consciousness of our people, they do not see it as an end in itself. We see that we are at present a cultural nation (a colonialized nation whose culture is suppressed and exploited) seeking to become an independent nation state. This means that we African people, held in captivity inside the United States, have a common culture, way of life and history, heritage and destiny. We also have a common economic existence, political posture, and up until recently (the last twenty years) occupied a common territory. Revolutionary black nationalists believe cultural nationalism is only beneficial when it leads to helping revolutionary political nationalism.

The two major supporters of cultural nationalism are Maulana Ron Karenga and Imamu Amiri Baraka. While both Maulana and Imamu work together, there are major differences in their approach. Maulana, who believes strongly in one man leadership, has a dangerous tendency toward being very egotistical. Egotistical leadership is counter-revolutionary, anti-people and only serves to further divide the community. The black nation needs a selfless collective leadership devoid of ego that is dedicated to serving our people. Egotistical leadership will only lead to endless internal war over who is greater than "me." It will lead to nationalist gang war. Egotistical, self-centered, self-styled leaders, who usually work secretly with the enemy, must be isolated and if necessary, driven out of the black community.

If black nationalists are going to build a new value system, it must be built on new values that are beneficial to the unification and liberation of the black nation. A new black value system cannot be based on messianic (one man) egotistical leadership and fascist authority. It must be based on collective leadership, socialism and democratic centralism.

THE SOUTHERN STRUGGLE FOR A REGIONAL INDEPENDENT NATION

As the black middle-class drives for political representation within the system, it will begin to realize that its class interests cannot be satisfied by reform of the political system of the United States. This, in return, will force the black middle-class and the black working class to become more nationalistic. The next logical historical step will be to raise the demand for an independent black republic. Black revolutionaries who call for open revolution (the overthrow of the entire enemy government) must realize that while this may have to be done, it is necessary to move our people to revolution, step by step. Our people have been mentally oppressed and do not as yet understand their power, so we must constantly move them to objectives which they understand they are capable of achieving.

The Republic of New Africa which is demanding the states of Mississippi, Georgia, Alabama, South Carolina and Louisiana call this "limited objective." The southern region is where 50 per cent of our people live. There are approximately 15 million black people living in the South. Many are becoming the majority of the major southern cities. Some southern states have a black majority population-wise. If the black population in the South is mobilized to demanding an independent nation, it will polarize the contradictions of the whole nation. Nationalism is usually an urban phenomenon.

The historical contradiction of black nationalism lies in the fact that in the past it was a northern urban based movement, while the majority of our people were southern rural based. But the social stratification of black America has changed with many of our people in the South being displaced from the land. The majority of our people in the South are becoming urban black proletariat. Black nationalists must develop tactics of moving our people step by step to independent nationhood. If black nationalists organize our people in the South in the plants, then they will have a base among the people.

While the struggle for an independent black republic may not be the ultimate phase of the black nationalist revolution, it is a necessary historical stage.

THE AFRICAN AMERICAN AND PAN-AFRICANISM

The African captive in America (overseas African) has always been active in the liberation of our motherland, Africa. Dr. W.E.B. DuBois as early as 1919 organized the first Pan-African Congress. From 1919 to 1945, the Pan-African congresses served as a forum for African intellectuals at home and abroad. The Pan-African Congress in 1945, developed the tactics of direct action for the liberation of the mainland. The Pan-African movement has advanced in gradual steps. Marcus Garvey, the father of nationalism, also had as an objective the liberation of a unified central African government.

Stokely Carmichael, the mass spokesman for Black Power, returned from Africa last year saying that Pan-Africanism must become the mass philosophy of the African-American. Stokely studied for some time under Nkrumah in Guinea. At that time, Brother Carmichael's new strategy called for the African-American to

23 Careers for the Future

Geologists — Increased demand for domestic natural resources will mean greater job opportunities for geology graduates. Average starting salaries in private industry for those with bachelor's, master's and Ph.D.'s were $10,500, $12,200 and $16,000, respectively.

Geophysicists — Most positions will be available in petroleum and natural gas companies, exploration and consulting firms, and research institutes. Starting salaries varied from $10,500 for holders of bachelor's degrees to more than $16,000 for doctorates.

Meteorologists — A bachelor's degree is minimum requirement for entry level jobs, but advanced degrees are increasingly necessary for advancement. Entry level jobs with a bachelor's degree start at $8,500, while those with master's and doctorates begin at $10,520 and $12,841. Airline meteorologists averaged $14,400 to start, and those with experience earned up to $21,600 a year.

Oceanographers — Those with Ph.D.'s will have the best opportunities in oceanography. The federal government paid bachelor's degree holders starting salaries of $8,500 or $10,520 a year. Those with master's and doctorates could start as high as $13,000 and $18,500. Average salary for experienced oceanographers was $21,800 a year.

Biochemists — Best job opportunities available for those with advanced degrees. Medical research and environmental protection will provide greatest number of openings: Average earnings for bachelor's degree holders was $15,000.

Life Scientists — Best opportunities are for those with advanced degrees, especially a Ph.D. In private industry, salary offers for bachelor's candidates averaged about $9,400; and in the federal government, master's and Ph.D.'s could begin at $10,520 and $18,500.

Soil Scientists — Excellent opportunities within the federal government, state experiment stations and colleges of agriculture. Earnings range from $9,000 for a B.S. graduate with no experience to more than $26,000.

Statisticians — Favorable opportunities for those with training combined with engineering and economics. Average salaries exceeded $21,000 a year.

Chemists — Excellent prospects for graduates at all degree levels. Experienced chemists with a bachelor's degree averaged $18,000, with masters, $18,400, and with Ph.D.'s, $21,700.

Food Scientists — Best opportunities will be for those with advanced degrees, but openings will be available at all degree levels. Average starting salaries for bachelor's degree holders was about $10,000; master's $12,000, doctorates, $15,000.

Physicists — Graduate work in physics is almost essential for entry level jobs and advancement. In manufacturing industries, a bachelor's degree holder could earn close to $11,000 to start, and for master's and Ph.D. holders, $13,000 and $18,000, respectively.

OFFICE OCCUPATIONS

Programmers — Employers who use computers for scientific or engineering applications prefer college graduates with degrees in physical sciences, mathematics, engineering or computer science. Earnings averaged from $200 weekly for beginners to $500 weekly for experienced programmers.

Systems Analysts — Most employers prefer applicants with backgrounds in accounting, mathematics, business, economics, computer science, engineering and physical sciences. Beginning analysts can expect to earn $250 weekly or more.

Bank Officers — Many opportunities will become available in such positions as bank presidents, vice presidents, controllers, cashiers, junior and senior officers. College graduates may start at about $800 or more a month; senior bank officials often earn several times the salaries of beginning officials.

Insurance Actuaries — Most companies require a major in mathematics or statistics. Applicants who have passed actuarial exams averaged $11,100. Top executives may earn in excess of $35,000.

Claim Representatives — College degree is not always required, but usually preferred. Claim adjusters averaged close to $12,000 a year, with supervisors earning $14,000 or more than $20,000.

Underwriters — Many employers prefer degrees in liberal arts or business administration. Average salary for underwriters was $12,500 annually; many supervisors earned in excess of $17,000.

Accountants — Training in computer technology and part-time experience are becoming increasingly important. Salaries for beginning accountants averaged $9,700 a year, while earnings of experienced accountants ranged from $13,300 to nearly $20,000. Accountants in the federal government averaged about $23,000 a year.

Advertising Workers — Many openings projected for managers, account executives, research directors, copywriters, media directors, production managers, and artists and layout workers. Beginning advertising workers can expect to earn at least $10,000. Experienced advertising workers often earn more than $25,000 a year, some as much as $50,000 or more.

Buyers — Most firms prefer college graduates in any field of study and train them on the job. Newly hired buyers started at $8,300 to $9,000, though some begin as high as $12,000. Mass merchandising firms pay considerably higher salaries.

City Managers — A master's degree is increasingly important. Annual salaries ranged from $12,000 in cities of 5,000 or more to more than $40,000 in cities of over 250,000.

Credit Managers — Employers usually seek business administration, economics or accounting majors. Beginning salaries ranged from $7,000 to $10,000, with earning potential for experienced managers well over $40,000 annually.

Hotel Managers and Assistants — Best preparation is a four-year curriculum in hotel and restaurant management. Salaries vary widely, but a newly hired manager may earn from $8,000 to $12,000. Top earnings are in excess of $50,000.

Marketing Research Workers — Graduate training is important for specialized positions and advancement. Starting salaries for research trainees begin at about $10,000, and persons with master's degrees began at higher salary levels. Experienced workers averaged more than $16,000 a year.

Free Assata

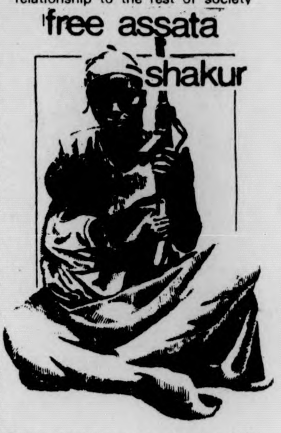
Assata Shakur was convicted by an all white jury in New Brunswick, New Jersey on March 25, 1977. The jury deliberated for a total of 22 hours, and returned guilty verdicts on all eight counts. Judge Theodore Appleby immediately sentenced Assata to life in prison on the first charge — murder of Trooper Werner Foerster. Sentencing on the other charges will come within the next few weeks. Assata has been transferred twice during the last two weeks, first to Clinton Women's Prison and later to Hardville Men's Prison. She is awaiting pre-trial hearings on a separate case in Brooklyn Supreme Court although the March 25 conviction sentenced her to life imprisonment. What Assata is facing can be anticipated by looking at the sentence imposed on Sundiata Acoli (Clark Squire) whose trial was severed from Assata's in 1974 — he was given life plus 30 years.

When Judge Theodore Appleby sentenced Assata to life imprisonment, she made a statement to the jury saying that she regretted in a trial that was set up to convict her from the outset, and she called the jury "racist." She told that group of jurors that they had convicted "a woman who was shot in the back with her arms in the air". At a press conference after the verdict, chief counsel William Kunstler said that the jury had been unable to overcome four years of pre-trial publicity and 400 years of endemic racism in this country. He said he was ashamed of having believed it was possible for a Black woman to be judged on the facts of the case under the present system.

Prosecutor Edward Barone told the press the only racism in the case was that introduced by the defense. This was the man who earlier in the week had participated in a conversation with the court clerk which was designed to provoke Assata's lawyers. The clerk stated that all Assata needed "was a big black dick up her ass." Barone made a statement about "Jews and Niggers" and informed his audience that he will have a chance to be "governor after this case."

Assata's conviction brought out supporters who stated that her conviction is symbolic of the United States government's hypocrisy on the issues of human rights. At a demonstration on March 26 outside the New Brunswick jail Al-Jundi of the Attica Committee to Free Dacajeweiah, said that this had been another case of a jury being used to suppress Black people. He said the state's legal apparatus had clearly been used to convict Assata in what was definitely a political trial. She had been portrayed in the media as a terrorist, he said, while in reality she was a fighter for her community.

What Assata's conviction represents is a symbolic lynching. Her conviction, like that of Earl Brown and Craeman Gethers, is meant to demonstrate to Blacks that they should understand their relationship to the rest of society has not changed in the last 100 years. Her conviction is a warning. For whites who accept their privileged position it represents an affirmation of white power.



Assata's conviction will be appealed. The most immediate factor in overturning the verdict is to seek a mistrial based on the report that one of the jurors broke out of sequestration twice to go out and buy liquor. The prosecutor himself admitted that if these allegations can be proved, they would be sufficient grounds for declaring a mistrial. A notice of appeal will be filed within 45 days after sentencing. It is clear from records of the entire trial proceedings that there are many grounds on which to base the appeal, including the racism of the jury selection process and the bias of the judge, to mention only two of the most obvious. On April 20 the National Black Lawyers Association will present their concerns at a hearing in Trenton, New Jersey.

The Assata Shakur Defense Committee has asked that anyone who wants to support Assata's defense in any way should write to them at 339 Lafayette Street, New York, N.Y. 10012 or call (212) 673-4177.

concentrate his efforts on possibly bringing Nkrumah back into power in Ghana. The land base that would be liberated would become a Pan-African state on which the Pan-African revolution would be based. Brothers and sisters in the states are told that struggling for revolution in the United States will be a protracted affair and not possible at this time. Many call his position a "cop-out." We must realize that all people must make their own indigenous revolution led by people from their own country. This doesn't mean we shouldn't help the brothers and sisters on the mainland. We should help where we can, but we must concentrate our efforts where we are. And if understand the nature of imperialism and neo-colonialism, we will realize that if we did create a Pan-African socialst state, it would be faced with encirclement and intervention from the United States government. Africans in America and the Caribbean are actually Africa's military rear.

In order for Africa to be truly liberated, a world war of liberation must be fought between Africa, Europe and America. We are engaged in a world black revolution. It is then necessary to develop tactics for all Africans world wide. Being in a protracted international war of national liberation, it is necessary for Africans to wage struggle in the country where they are colonialized. We are up against an international crisis in the capitalist-imperialist system. This means we must organize national Pan-African movements that can move to seize state power in their region.

At the same time, we must develop an international African consciousness among our people so that when the enemy moves to encircle and crush a national African revolution, we can come to its aid by creating a crisis somewhere else, forcing the enemy to overextend himself. While this may be our war strategy, we must encourage Africans in America and the Caribbean with skills to go to progressive African states and build those states into strong Pan-African bases.

REPRESSION AND BLACK REVOLUTION

As the black revolution intensifies, it will become more threatening to the white power structure. The urban insurrections of the 1960's showed the revolutionary potential of the black national liberation movement. The federal government, through its intelligence apparatus, has analyzed the black liberation movement to be a potential national democratic revolution. In order to prevent the black revolution from reaching its objectives, certain forces within the power structure are moving to crush our struggle before it reaches the stage where it cannot be stopped. As a result, a conspiracy has been brewing and widening over the last 10 years. Groups such as the John Birch Society, Minutemen, Ku Klux Klan, American Independent Party, White Peoples Party, Rangers, White Christian Movement, have consolidates as the "radical right." These groups are intertwined and connected with big business, Pentagon, Government Intelligence (CIA, DIA) IRS, Secret Service, Army Intelligence, FBI, House Internal Security Committee, National Defense, and southern racist and northern conservative liberals who constitute the "legalistic right."

These forces are moving as fast as they can to create a political atmosphere of hysteria; in order to make conditions such that the President would appear justified in declaring a national emergency. The "right" is preparing to make America an open fascistic state. Under the provisions of the McCarren Act, the President of the U.S. can declare a national emergency on grounds of insurrection or attack from a foreign enemy. At present, through the files and dossiers of the government intelligence agency, all black groups and leftist political groups are under 24 hour surveillance. Approximately one million people can be picked up and put in concentration camps within 24 hours.

Much of the intelligence information gets to government intelligence sources by way of local police who have a system of surveillance on all known black and leftist groups, who constantly send in agent provocateurs to destroy these groups. This is the climate, in reality, that black people must face in the 1970's. As white police become more politically racist, repression will become more intense for black America. As a result, all black people will soon by lumped together to be referred to as Black Panthers or Black Panther sympathizers. Black people must understand the historical condition that we are in. We must either unite or perish under a fascist racist America. There are several forms of struggle and organization that we must move to if we are to achieve self-determination.

Within our community, we must build a disciplined black revolutionary party that is capable of destroying the oppressors' means of oppression. This black revolutionary party must be highly sophisticated in the art of deception. It must form an infrastructure within the black community. This party must constantly move in uniting sectors of black America. The present period raises the need for a National Black Liberation Front.

Seeds Of Soul

GOD DID IT — WHY CAN'T WE

Almost all men have hidden desires to be Gods
In the beginning man was given a Soul and nothing else
This Soul was a projection of atoms from the Creators image
Man having no mind
Wondered about absent of direction
Not knowing his purpose was to grow and aid younger Souls in the knowledge of the Creators workmanship
With the ultimate growth being the realization that the soul is perfect and to return the soul home to absolute God awareness
so man was given a tool in which to reason and understand
This tool was called the mind
Man still was not complete so man was given a heart in which to feel
At which point man began to think feel and understand the lower worlds
Never advancing himself to the upper levels of the Universe which are higher levels of God awareness
Man having no knowledge of feminine traits had no warmth for woman
So God gave him a separate feminine soul which was called woman
This separate soul was to aid man and moving to the upper levels of the Universe Man however stride to move and control woman because of man's action woman rebelled and became man's opposite Man attempted to find God awareness through his ability to reason
Woman on the other side attempted to find God awareness through her ability of perception
Both working in opposite directions and in opposite souls
Therefore man and woman must merge and become one willing soul to find the balance point of their nature
As we are living in the soul of God everything of God must have a complete balance in order to move upward obtaining the knowledge of his light mind
At which point one will experience the divine absolute truth that man being of God are Gods
It is also important to realize that true knowing lies within the soul of man which is the soul of God
In order to obtain such knowing one must divorce himself from the outer world Obtaining the path of the divine which is the path of the soul
Absolute God Awareness is absolute self or soul Awareness
The simplicity of an open heart and mind will breed love
There is nothing that love cannot over rule and its balance state of Man and Woman

A POEM FOR MY SISTER

This is not a poem of emotions yet to you my heart, like days into years, races towards an eternal goal.
This is not a poem of romance, of sweet nothings which pollutes the air, yet it is your beauty, your growth, you,
which makes me care.
This is not a poem of adjectives illuminating a colorful scene of warmth and passions as to elude the realms of naturalness yet it is a cry for the bright living, life giving substances of your inner most being. A cry which from me to you reality is within.
This is not a poem of hunger which burns deep within, a hunger to grasp and hold, and to taste and waste the physical wonder that you are
This is a poem to call, to summons the women in you, which from me is too far.
This is not a poem of pretty sayings,
of weakness and fatigue,
rather a poem of beauty and strength
a poem of the noblest of seeds.
This poem was written with designs which colors accents only you,
This poem was written with meaning which simply was meant to be true.
Words are agents of growth, the only liable way,
words making people and people making words,
and thus the beginnings of a new day.
This is not an attempt to disguise those things which are real,
rather an attempt to expose lies, and the zeals
of their falsified appeals.
This is not a poem of nonsense covered and made opaque by a cloudy misunderstanding of me,
This is a poem that comes on the clearest day which for miles and miles you can see the deep majestic sea.
This is a poem of Love
Love for yesterday, today and tomorrow.
A love Supreme which shall shine its light bright, everyday everynight.
A light to which everybody will be intune,
a light which shall always be at high noon.
Sister: This is a poem of You and Me,
This is a poem of us three.

Distant Voices

On Saturday, April 23 at 8:00 p.m. in Hampden, D.C. there will be the Play Distant Voices. The conception of the play is by Diane Thomas Hale and is based on the premise that too few of us are familiar with the works of African American women playwrights. The play is an enactment of several scenes from major plays by African-American women. The thematic design of Distant Voices is as varied as the playwrights represented, injustice; revolution; murder; divorce; abortion; religion; and poverty, represent separate issues effectively dealt with by the individual playwrights which are collaged with an overview on the works of more than one hundred African-American women playwrights to emphasize a common thread of social consciousness.

The objective surrounding the production of Distant Voices is three-fold. To place in vivid perspective through analytical research and study the dynamics of African-American Theater as it reflects and projects the works of African-American women playwrights; to provide practical and theoretical experience for community theatre artists seeking a basic grounding in the above; to provide the University community with an informative historical perspective on the works of African-American women playwrights.

On Sunday April 24 at New Africa House there will be 360 degrees of Fashion. The fashion show will provide a showcase for creative talents of local Third World Women. It will demonstrate how fashion affects our looks and personal image. After the show there will be a community pot luck dinner. Everyone is welcome and urged to bring a favorite dish of theirs.

Groups argue SATF budget

By SAMUEL P. HASSAN
Collegian Staff

Last night in the Student Union Council Chambers, three Student Senate leaders presented their controversial $1.1 million Student Activities Tax Fund (SATF) budget to an open meeting of 20 students, most representing groups contesting their budget allocations.

Senate speaker Brian J. DeLima, Treasurer Thomas Kerrins, and Budget Committee Chairperson Jay Milender heard Student Federal Credit Union (SFCU) members defend their budget rationale, which has been approved by the senate's budget committee, but faces a tough floor fight at tonight's senate meeting on the budget.

Vice-Chancellor for Student Affairs Robert L. Woodbury has said that senate funding of the UMass SFCU would be illegal.

Kerrins and SFCU members sought the legal opinion of the Student Legal Services Office last week, an opinion that favors the legality of the funding.

Kerrins said that while he supports the SFCU funding proposal, "we shouldn't jeopardize the budget by placing something on it that has been considered illegal by the administration, at least until we prove the legality of it."

Budget Committee Chairperson Milender said, "If the legality of funding the credit union wasn't questioned, their budget would be in the budget act. After all, we accepted their rationale."

Former Budget Committee Co-chairperson and unsuccessful candidate for Student Government Association Co-President John Foley said at the meeting, "The Credit Union has failed to provide student services such as check cashing and NOW accounts."

DeLima said he has, "a legitimate concern as to whether the SFCU should be funded," but that tonight's meeting will cover," all facets of the SFCU funding proposal," not just the legality of it.

Several members of Ahora, an organization of Spanish speaking students, expressed dissatisfaction with their budget allocation, a 75 per cent decrease from last year.

DeLima explained the Budget Committee was not allocating money to groups for student activities but rather that monies for student activities will be appropriated by the Senate Finance Committee.

The Finance Committee's proposed budget appropriation calls for an increase from last year's $15,000 to $47,000 for fiscal (FY) 1978. The increase will cover funding of student activities.

An unidentified student attending last night's meeting asked Kerrins why Resources Judaica did not receive funding. Kerrins said, "We have so many diverse cultures at the University that we've had to make a support account for cultural events," the Cultural Honoraria Support Fund.

Members of the Student Senate Transit Service (SSTS) and the Student Video Project (SVP) were present at the meeting, reportedly to defend their budget increases for FY '78. They did not, however, participate in or have the discussion directed to them.

Milender said at the onset of last night's meeting, "This meeting is for someone who's not into the senate trip to come and let their feelings be known on how the budget money has been allocated."

Seminar speakers discuss political economy of Mass.

By STEVE ANDERSON
Collegian Staff

The political economy of Massachusetts was the subject of a panel discussion held in Thompson 104 last night sponsored by the Socialist Education Committee of Economics Graduate Students (EGS).

The speakers were John Brouder, formerly of Low Income Planning Aid, a federally funded anti-poverty program, Carrie Hemenway of Northampton, a social services advocate, and Dottie Hayden, a clerical worker at UMass.

Brouder's speech dealt with the relationship between the business community and the state government from the revolution of the present day.

Brouder said the dominant idea is the state is neutral ground between varying interests that hinge on the public good. His radical idea is the state is the creation of the ruling class and exists to be manipulated by the business elite.

According to Brouder, the state of Massachusetts has not always been poor, and the present fiscal crisis is one result of the influence and manipulation of elite business interests in and out of the state. Many businesses no longer wish to lend money to the state and want a decline in state spending, thus the state has been forced to cut back on services.

Those budget cuts have a direct effect on the people who need the services most, said Brouder.

Last fall many businesses were threatening to leave the state, claiming they were losing money. According to Brouder the 10 largest corporate employers in the state had their best years ever in 1976.

Carrie Hemenway said from her experience working with the state, "people are the lowest priority." As an employe of the Hampden Community Action Commission (HCAC), Hemenway had her share of problems trying to organize a fight against budget cutbacks in the program. According to Hemenway, the budget for day care centers under HCAC was cut by 30 per cent and there is a constant fear of a total shutdown.

"Social services are largely a woman's issue," because women use them the most, said Hemenway.

Dottie Hayden discussed how budget cuts are affecting the classified workers at the University. As employes leave, they are not replaced, making more work for the rest. Raises are not forthcoming and money owed retroactively is in danger of being cut, she said. It has become a situation of more and more work with no incentives, monetary or otherwise, to help alleviate the situation.

She said clerical workers are encouraged to think of themselves as part of the management to further cut down on the effectiveness of organizing efforts.

Selectmen preview items for town meeting agenda

By JOE MAGLITTA
Collegian Staff

The Amherst Board of Selectmen last night reviewed items to be considered at the upcoming town meeting. Among the warrant articles presented for inclusion in the May 2 meeting were the establishment of a rent control commission, and the development of a no-interest loan fund for disaster victims.

The creation of a profit-making aluminum recycling center and town opposition to diverting water from the Connecticut River were also reviewed.

Discussion on the articles, which must be cleared with the board before consideration at the town meeting, were snagged on a group of three proposed by-laws dealing with the rights of Amherst tenants.

Article 41, "Security deposit trust fund," would guarantee tenants interest due them from security deposits on apartments. Landlords not complying with the by-law would be subject to penalties.

Under the proposal, money for security deposits would be placed in a joint-account between tenant and landlord. Assessed damages could be negotiated between the two without going to court.

Similarly, a pair of articles filed by the Amherst Tenants Association calling for rent control and regular town inspections of all rental-units came under attack by the president of the Pioneer Valley Housing Authority, Steven Puffer.

Puffer said the three articles were "not acceptable" in their present form. He said it would be difficult for tenants and landlords to agree on how much of the security deposit should be kept by the landlords.

"Landlords don't like security deposits. But there are many inequities that landlords will not accept. Many people are reluctant to pay the last month's rent or insist on keeping dogs and the like. This is the only way we have to deal with these things," Puffer said.

Puffer said many reports have greatly exaggerated the low vacancy rate in Amherst. Instead of being around 1 per cent, he said, it is about 5.2 per cent. He claimed people have over-reacted to the housing situation.

In another proposal last night, an article sponsored by the Hampshire County Alternative Energy Coalition would bar transportation of radioactive waste materials within 100 miles of the town was discussed. Violators would face fines of up to $500.

A petition filed by Christina Platt would study the economics of Amherst's recycling center and make recommendations for the Fall 1977 town meeting. Platt's proposal would also request the town SCARCE committee map out an education and publicity program for the project.

Article 58, sponsored by Kenneth R. Mosakowski, called for the creation of a fund to aid town residents in fires, floods, insolvency and other financial crises. The no-interest relief fund would be administered by a selectmen-appointed committee.

Summer school offers basic skills program

By EILEEN FOLEY
Collegian Staff

This summer the University Summer Sessions program will offer a series of workshops and seminars covering basic skills and information important to both education and survival at the University.

According to Summer Skills spokesperson Steve Keane, the program is "pretty much experimental". Working from a starting budget of $2000 for the summer, it is hoped there will be enough response to the program to warrant future expansion.

The program was originated by Summer Sessions Director Alan Ashton in response to the decline in test scores of students entering the University and, more specifically, faculty complaints about an increasing lack of basic learning skills among students.

Said Keane, "The idea was basically that there were a number of students at UMass who needed enrichment or skills courses in order to succeed at the University."

The program is open to all Summer Sessions students, Continuing Education students, and visiting students at no charge, and to interested non-students for a nominal fee. These courses are ungraded, unrecorded and non-credit.

Two types of programs workshops and seminars will be offered. Workshops tentatively include UMass Survival Career Development, BCP Career Development, Library-Literature Searching for Research and Dissertations, Independent Study-Alternative Credit at UMass, Career Searching, and Resume Writing.

Seminars include Test Taking Skills, Note Taking Skills, Rapid Transdisciplinary Reading, Grammar and Writing Skills Lab, UMass Computer — Student Need, Student Use, Math Skills, and Career Development and Life Planning Skills. These courses will be taught by Summer Sessions personnel including teaching assistants, professors, and some administrators with background in pertinent areas.

Although incoming students are particularly urged to take advantage of the program, as an aid in making the transition from high school to college, Keane noted the program also offers courses useful to many other students. He said the Library-Literature Workshop and the UMass Computer Seminar would be useful to graduate students and junior and senior undergraduates involved in extensive research.

Costs for the program are absorbed into the fees from Summer Sessions students, although some programs may require an additional lab fee. Non-students who wish to participate must pay an initial $5 registration fee, after which all workshops and seminars are open to them, but with a $15 charge per seminar. Registration for workshops and seminars can be made in advance, by mail, or in person at Summer Sessions Registration in Boyden Gym.

NW Road Committee to present one motion

By CHRIS BOURNE
Collegian Staff

At a breakfast meeting yesterday, the Northwest Road Committee decided to present its report to the town meeting as one motion, said Committee chairman Merle Howes.

The Committee had been considering presenting each of the seven parts of the report as a separate motion.

The decision was made mainly because of parliamentary procedure rules, according to Committee member Gerald Grady.

Both Howes and Grady said anyone who wished to change the report would have to introduce a motion to amend the report at the town meeting.

Committee member Richard Minear said he plans to introduce a motion that would delete recommendation 2 of the report. That recommendation calls for a road to be built through the former Taylor Farm, linking North Pleasant St. with an extension of Commonwealth Ave.

Minear has opposed the road on the grounds that it would not divert a great amount of traffic and it would create a hazard to children walking to the Marks Meadow School and other pedestrians.

At an informational meeting held last week for town residents, reaction to the proposal was almost entirely negative.

"I think people want to take a hard look at any new road construction before they go ahead with it," said Howes.

Engineers to float cement boat

A group of students will lower a couple of blocks of concrete into the campus pond today and hope they don't sink.

The students are members of the American Society of Civil Engineers Concrete Canoe Team here and they are launching two new vessels at noon.

This is the third consecutive year civil engineering students have constructed the canoes, and if all goes well today the 14-member team will pack off to Bangor, Maine for a white water concrete canoe competition Saturday.

"The last two years we've won best design and construction," says Frank Bonaventura, team captain. The white canoes have wire skeletons sandwiched between layers of fiberglass mesh.

Today's launching is being preceeded by a procession, complete with pep band, when the canoes will be transported from Marston Hall to the pond.

The project is the result of an upper-level, three-credit civil engineering course, according to Bonaventura.

"We're trying to build anything that could be mass produced," he said.

Grad exams to include new section

By JOHN MORAN
Collegian Staff

The Educational Testing Service (ETS) has announced a new section to the Graduate Record Examination (GRE) Aptitude Test which will measure "analytical skills". The section will join the two traditional areas which test verbal and qualitative skills in the October testing of the GRE.

Despite the new addition, the GRE will remain a three hour test since the other two areas have been shortened.

"The new measure will test a student's skills in a number of areas. Student's will be able to show their ability to recognize logical relationships, draw conclusions from a complex series of statements, and determine relationships between independent or interdependent categories of groups," according to Janis Somerville, GRE program director at ETS.

"Three types of questions will be used in the analytical section: analysis of explanations, logical diagrams, and analytical reasoning questions, each designed to test a different aspect of analytical ability," Somerville said.

The change is the first since the current form of the Aptitude Test was introduced in the 1940's. The new questions are the result of an extensive research effort initiated by the Graduate Record Examinations Board that showed that analytical skills can be distinguished from verbal and quantitative skills and are related to academic success.

Students, faculty members, and administrators from all over the country were consulted in the various planning stages of the change in the exam, according to James Neilland of the ETS in Princeton, New Jersy.

The GRE is offered six times each year and is taken by 300,000 students annually as part of the admissions process to graduate school.

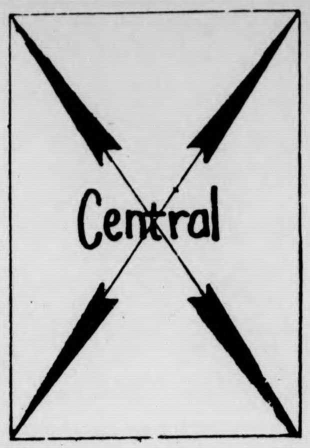
"The same research effort that produced the new measure also yielded shorter versions of the verbal and quantitative sections that are comparable in reliability and usefulness to the earlier and longer sections," said Somerville.

She also explained that no formal training in logic or methods of analysis is required to do well on the new measure.

"Some analytical skills are required and developed in virtually all fields of study," she said, "and, like verbal and quantitative skills, analytical skills are developed over a long period of time and are not believed to be improved to any significant degree by intensive study in a brief period of time."

The 1977-78 GRE Bulletin of Information will describe the measure and will include sample questions and explanations of answers.

Central leaders say 'bye'



By JUDITH STEIN

The Central Area Council (CAC) met for a brief session last night in which President Janice Perry and Treasurer Rob Cannon made farewell speeches to the presiding members before their withdrawal from the CAC following the area elections to be held Thursday in Franklin dining commons.

Perry and Cannon also stated their endorsement of Rich Fryer, candidate for vice-president of the CAC.

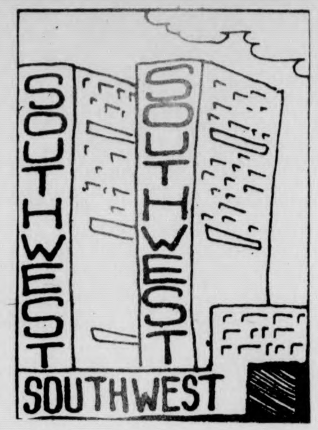
Other actions communicated during the evening dealt with the allocation of $190 to benefit the Greenough Snack Bar. A sum of $78 from this fund will be utilized for repair of Capital equipment and the remainder will go toward miscellaneous kitchen items. This decision was passed unanimously.

CAC also reviewed the Undergraduate Student Senate meeting of this week. The proposal to ban smoking in elevators, classrooms when classes are in session, and in certain areas of the dining commons was discussed. Plans for the Spring Concert were also discussed.

Plans for the Central area Spring Concert were also discussed. The concert will be held May 1, with May 7 as a rain date. There will be five bands and refreshments.

In final action, CAC composed a formal complaint to Gov. Michael S. Dukakis stating their dismay with his appointment of the limited amount of money for next year's budget. They stated their reasons for disapproval, such as the effect each student will feel in the decline on education. They are asking for reconsideration on behalf of the Central Area residents.

SWA obeys ruling



By LARRY COHEN
Collegian Staff

The Southwest Assembly (SWA) held a Constitutional Convention last night, and amended the Southwest Constitution according to the guidelines set up by Student Attorney General Paul Yanowitch.

Yanowitch ruled on March 29 that all area government Executive Committee elections be by popular vote, making the Southwest Constitution change necessary before its elections could be held.

The Constitutional Convention amended the Southwest Constitution to read "The offices of the Assembly, President, Vice-President, Co-treasurers, and Communications Co-ordinator shall be elected by popular election, by members in good standing of Southwest Residential College during the month of April as determined by the Elections Committee. There shall be a minimum of two central polling places."

The Convention defeated a proposal which would have filled vacancies in the SWA by either special election or appointment by the House Council of the house involved. The proposal, according to Yanowitch, is unconstitutional because it provides for unequal representation in the Assembly.

In other business last night, the SWA voted to allocate $500 to one member of the Executive Committee, who will stay at UMass during the summer. That person has not yet been named, pending the result of Southwest's Executive Committee elections, to be held Thursday.

Local musician masters ancient instrument

By MARSHA KAZAROSIAN
Collegian Staff

On the evening of April 13, 1977, about 70 Amherst area students accepted an invitation to be treated to the mystical experience of South Indian Classical music.

The performing artist, (and I say artist in the total sense of the word), H. Collins Lein, displayed his talent and understanding of the music through the vina, an ancient traditional instrument of India.

The vina, a large, long instrument, fretted with seven strings, is traditionally an instrument reserved only for the high priests or Brahmin of South India, and is generally confined to use in temples and courts.

Lein, kept his recital in the ancient, almost religious manner of the vina's history. His music and technique were both in the old style.

The concert opened with the smell of burning incense on stage as Lein introduced his accompanying performers.

A second vina was played by Prof. David Reck, of Amherst College, Lein's teacher and guru. The tabla, a North Indian classical set of drums was played by Rupak Bajracharya of UMass and the traditional drone instrument, the tamboura, made by Lein, was played by Nancy Babb. The tala, or spiritual rhythm was kept by Indira Shetterly.

Several of the pieces were preceded by a short alapana, or improvisational meeting of the audience and the raga, the mode of the music to be played in the particular piece. The alapana allows the performer to truly display his understanding of the music.

The concert started with a light air, mostly liltly songs. As the recital continued, the music became a bit more mystical and deep, and ending with a very traditional hymn.

Each performance was received with the enthusiastic applause it deserved, providing the audience was indeed as involved as the performers.

The recital was the culmination of an intensive two-year study by Lein, the debuting talent. He has been concentrating in the Carnatic (South Indian Music) tradition of South India.

Lein has studied performance, theory, history and ethnomusicological aspects of the tradition under the guidance of Reck.

Part of this study has been the making of a vina and a tamboura by Lein.

Lein, whose actual BDIC (Bachelor's Degree in Individual Concentration) is World Monastic Music, plans to study in Turkey at the Conservatory in Istanbul during the summer. His study, however, is not only the history of the music, but also the actual performance.

As Lein says, "Playing the instrument is the most important thing from an artistic and psychological point of view."

He certainly has proven this in his intensive study of the vina. As he showed us at the recital, his understanding of this music is fantastic, and his accomplishment on the instrument is unusual for the limited amount of time he has had to study it.

Thank you, Mr. H. Collins Lein for the skillful performance and pleasant introduction to South Indian Classical Music.

H. Collins Lein made his public debut on the vina, an ancient instrument of India, traditionally reserved for high priests.

Band set to perform speech set to music

By ROBERT L. DAVIDSON
Collegian Staff

Horace C. Boyer, a well known authority on Black American music, will narrate Vincent Persichetti's "Lincoln Address" when the UMass Symphony Band performs the piece during its annual Spring concert tonight at 8 p.m. in the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall.

The text of "Lincoln Address" is from Abraham Lincoln's second inaugural address. The piece was commissioned by the 1973 Presidential Inaugural Committee for Richard M. Nixon's second inauguration.

"This is a very interesting piece because it's the second piece by a major American composer to utilize the text of speeches of Lincoln in musical compositions," said Boyer.

"They are interesting not because of the context itself but because the [illegible] considered the text so potent that melody would add nothing to their meaning," added Boyer.

Boyer has been an assistant professor of music at UMass since 1973. He is also the director of the Voices of New Africa House Workshop Choir.

Boyer received a bachelor's degree in music from Bethune-Cookman College, a master's degree in music theory and voice and a doctorate in music theory from the Eastman School of Music of the University of Rochester.

He is also a member of the Boyer Brothers, a gospel-singing group that has performed throughout the southern and southwestern regions of the United States.

Boyer is currently working on the completion of his first book "Afro-American Church Music."

The theme of the concert is folk and nationalistic music. There will be no admission charge.

Black Affairs

How many Pur-year?

By R.S. GORDON
Special to Black Affairs

The late Dr. Shirley Graham DuBois, author, scholar, educator playwright and one time Visiting Lecturer here at UMass, said to me in a candid interview shortly before her passing, "I believe that things will get worse before they get better, and I believe that Black people will bear the brunt of it." Truer words could not have been spoken. Paul L. Puryear, Vice Chancellor for Academic Affairs and Provost can readily attest to this as fact.

Dr. Puryear, for several weeks now, has been on the UMass "hot seat" because of his recent faculty reallocation proposal that would eliminate 28 faculty positions and drastically reduce the number of professors tenured over the next five years. The proposal would also eliminate programs such as Asian Studies and Slavic languages by 1982 along with several decreases and some increases in other academic departments as needed.

In recent issues of the Collegian, headlines have appeared such as "Provosts Angers Faculty Senate", "Puryear Plan Stirs Dissatisfaction" and "Puryear Report Criticized". In Thursday's Collegian (April 14) the W.E.B. DuBois Department of Afro-American Studies charged many white professors, including members of the Massachusetts Society of Professors (MSP), with racism in their handling of the Puryear Proposal and demanded a formal apology to the Provost by all those involved.

To be more specific, Afro-Am's open letter to the faculty states that members of the department "are forced to conclude that a substantial portion of the antagonism and hostility directed toward the Chancellor and the Provost by some segments of the faculty is motivated by racism." Afro-Am concedes that over the past several years there has been substantial racial hostility on campus, at all levels and point out that "the organizing and election of a (faculty) union, and the hiring of Paul Puryear" have triggered "more virulent racial hostility of the past few years." Clarifying their accusations even further, Afro-Am continues; "The appointment of Paul Puryear as Vice-Chancellor for Academic Affairs and Provost has unleased some of the most irrational and racist behavior that we have ever seen on the campus of a university." The actions of many white faculty members are characterized as "ignorant," "irrational," "barbaric" and possessing a "lynch mob atmosphere".

News Analysis

In response to these accusations, the Executive Committee of the MSP, in a letter, characterizes the remarks made by the Department of Afro-American Studies as "unfortunate", and released this statement; "While the MSP recognizes that progress towards the goals of Affirmative Action has been made in recent years through the hiring of women and minorities in faculty and staff positions, we believe that special efforts must continue to be made to consolidate and considerably improve on the gains of the past."

From the events preceeding this article, it is clear that the university is facing another crisis. Unfortunately, this one cannot be solved by censoring alternative media, or by throwing a few so-called "trouble makers" (like this reporter) out of the university confines. In this instance, the "rouble makers" are not students at all, but tenured faculty members. The charges of "racism" by an entire academic department has only reiterated earlier claims by students who were severely "disciplined" for their accusations.

Let us not forget the mounting dissension and discord in our faculty ranks, certainly not a very health atmosphere for students. If the W.E.B. DuBois Department of Afro-American Studies accusation are correct, are we, in fact, being taught by racist professors who do not have our interest at heart? Is this the reason for last year's poor academic showing among CCEBS students? If not, then what is the reason for this sudden political outcry from our Black faculty? (Usually more active during summer intersession). Has the Afro-Am department really disregarded the social and economic penalties that could obviously follow this type of public statement? They have been very careful not to in the past.)

By asking these questions, I only hope to generate capable minds to come up with a workable solution, surely I expect no immediate answers. However, most certainly, these issues must be addressed so that students will know in which direction to turn. I am pleased to know that regardless of professional status or economic stability, Black people cannot escape the fate of their less fortunate brothers and sisters. "We're all in the same boat."

To Provost Paul L. Puryear, although I was not here to formally welcome you upon your arrival from "Down South" to "Up South" (my apologies — I had been thrown out of school, for among other things, investigating and reporting racist elements in the university community). In any case. "Welcome to the club, to Massacippi and the University, thereof."

Dr. Weising coming to speak at UMass

"THE CONSPIRACY TOMAKE BLACKS INFERIOR"

> "We're being manipulated, to keep showing us over and over again that we're zeros. The most painful thing is when you do not understand what you are doing. It is one thing to be informed and know that you are degrading yourself and your group but something else not to understand that you're killing your mother and your children."

Thus has Dr. Frances Welsing continued to speak out unequivocably about the nature of racism (white supremacy) and the effects that it has on Black people. Much of her research and analysis has been compiled in the "Cress Theory of Color Confrontation" which states the following:

> "White or color-deficient Europeans responded psychologically with a profound sense of numerical inadequacy and color inferiority upon their confrontations with the massive majority of the world's people, all of whom possessed varying degrees of color-producing capacity. This psychological response, be it described as conscious or unconscious, was one of deeply sensed inadequacy which struck a blow at the most obvious and fundamental part of their being, their external appearance.

Dr. Welsing has developed the Cress Theory as a result of many experiences. She grew up in Chicago and attended public school there. Her decision to enter Howard Medical School in 1958 was a continuation in the line of her father and grandfather who had both been physicians in Chicago. Upon completion of a residency in general psychiatry in 1966, she held a Fellowship in Child Psychiatry at St. Elizabeth's Hospital in Washington, D.C. until 1968, an Assistant Professor of Pediatrics position at Howard University College of Medicine until 1975, and was Clinical Director of the Psychoeducational Institute, Hillcrest Children's Center, until 1976. Currently, she is on the staff of the Office of Children and Youth Mental Health Services under the Government in Washington, D.C.

Dr. Frances Cress Welsing will be speaking on Wednesday, April 20, at 8:00 p.m., in the Student Union Ballroom, on "The Conspiracy to Make Blacks Inferior." In addition, she will hold a workshop for Black men and women that same afternoon at 3:00 p.m. in New Africa House. We hope you will attend.

Ex-Prime Minister to Lecture

Dr. Cheddi Jagan, three times popularly elected Prime Minister of British Guiana (South America) and author of the widely-acclaimed The West On Trial: The Fight For Guyana's Freedom, will speak at the University on Thursday, April 21, at 7:30 p.m. in the auditorium of the Public Health Building. Dr. Jagan's subject will be "The Struggle for Economic Independence in Africa, Asia, Latin America and the Caribbean."

Dr. Jagan is the son of indentured plantation workers imported from India to Guiana in 1901. After his early education in Guiana, Dr. Jagan came to the United States in 1936 and worked his way through Howard University and the Y.M.C.A. College in Chicago before taking his degree in dentistry at Northwestern University. Returning home in 1943, he organized the oppressed sugar workers into the People's Progressive Party in 1950 and commenced the political struggle for Guianese independence from Britain which was to occupy the next ten years of his life. Imprisoned by the British for his political activities in 1954, he was elected president of the British Guiana Rice Producers Association shortly after his release from prison. From 1957 to 1961, Dr. Jagan served as Minister of Trade and Industry in Guiana and was elected Prime Minister in the latter year. Manuevered out of office in 1964 with the assistance of the West, Cheddi Jagan is the principal leader of the opposition in Guyana today and one of the world's foremost critics of western intervention in the affairs of Third World nations.

Are your legs flabby?

Sit down for a minute, ask yourself these questions, and then answer them honestly.

1. Are you able to wear a bathing suit without shame or embarrassment?
2. Do you have midriff bulge?
3. Are you afraid to undress in front of a mirror?
4. Are your legs flabby?
5. Do people frequently ask you if you are pregnant?
6. Can you run up a flight of stairs without an attack of asthma?
7. Do you have a double chin?
8. Do you have dimples in other places besides your face?
9. Does your pants button pop when you sit down?
10. Can you see or even touch your toes?

Some of these questions might seem quite funny but think about them because if you didn't answer yes [illegible] any of [illegible] this time, you [illegible] be answering yes in 10 years [illegible] condition.

Jogging is one way to tighten up those flabby muscles. If you don't want to do it alone, find a friend to run with you. You don't have to run fast or far, if you're not used to it you should begin slowly. If running is not for you there are many exercises which you can also benefit from. It's never too late to begin exercising!

For those of you already exercising, don't stop just because you think you've reached that perfect shape or condition. Muscle tone begins deteriorating within 3 days if conditioning is not maintained. And just because you're exercising, don't be afraid that within a few weeks large muscles will begin protruding from your body. It takes quite a while and lots of determination to form bulging muscles and I doubt that any of us have the desire or the time to acquire them.

Many of the sisters in Southwest have really been getting into jogging and exercising and I'd like to see some of the sisters from other areas joining in sometime (not to say that you haven't been exercising but that I'd like to see all of us get together).

Robert Williams: Ex-President of the Republic of New Africa

Black Organizer's Conference

Friday April 15
Opening Remarks:

The political and economical rights gained in the 1960's have swindled, black people are slipping back into the conditions of the post reconstruction era. The rights attained because of the deaths of great men like Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. and Malcolm X were reforms of the document that is supposed to guarantee equal rights for all men were spaced out when the Nixon Administration came to power. No one's freedom is guaranteed in order for black people to have full economical and political rights we have to continue to fight those who would reduce the black race to a state of indentured servitude.

The Present Condition of Black People in the United States: Prof. Bill Strickland

Unemployment is at a staggering 9 per cent what this means is 9 million people are unable to find work, the majority of which are black. The prison systems in America are loaded with black men who are the victims of the economic crises in America which politicians are trying to ignore away because there is nothing that they can do about it. Black people voted overwhelmingly for James Earl Carter. He represented the progressive white in the minds of those who voted him in. President Carter has not lived up to his promise. In fact. he is conservative on spending money to create jobs. Blacks in America today unemployed imprisoned. Black children are miseducated regardless if or not they go to an integrated or segregated schools must awaken to the harsh reality that nothing comes free if black people are to be free we must fight for it.

THE PURPOSE OF THE BLACK ORGANIZERS CONFERENCE

Black people in the 1970's are faced with severe contradictions. What are some of these contradictions? They are, mass unemployment. Some 25 per cent or more of the black community is unemployed. The great majority of black people forced to live in inner city ghettos, live in sub-standard high rent houses. Black school children, those not bused into white schools, have to attend schools with inadequate facilities and worst of all are forced to be miseducated.

Our communities are flooded with drugs. Racist and politically reactionary police have made an axis with drug pushers, as they get kickbacks and are paid off through the drug culture. Black on black crime is reinforced, as a Negro mafia has willingly served the police as agents against social change and have become the C.I.A. connection in the black community. Black youth faced with unemployment turn more and more to crime as the only means of economic survival. As a result, jails and prisons across the country are now 80 per cent black.

Facist police frame black people by the hundreds every year to get them off the streets and have secretly entered into an alliance with right wing groups like the KKK and the minutemen in their over-kill plan to terrorize the young generation. This plan like operation phoenix used in Vietnam, is designed to immobilize black youth into fearing, fearing the power of the capitalist state: to instill an atmosphere of cynicism, defeat, despair, hopelessness, and fear to rebel or engage in revolution.

On top of all this, as economic conditions become worse for all poor people in America and reaches sectors of the middle class, black people, whor are the largest oppressed nationality in the United States are beginning to realize that our leaders, the late Malcolm X and Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. were both assasinated by the United States Government. Also, with the revelation of the Cointel pro documents it becomes very clear that an agency of the U.S. government, the FBI committeed murder and other means of destruction against the Black Liberation movement. This is "Genocide", the scientific and systematic destruction of a people by a government.

Faced with these facts and the growing reality that the gains won for black people in the 1960's are rapidly being eliminated, we gather on April 15th-17th to analyze our past and present situation, to struggle against our past weakness as a social movement and to develop new strengths for the struggle ahead.

Our task before us is to unite as many in the black community as possible behind a scientific program, ideology, and organization for our common oppressor and enemy is increasing it's war of genocide and repression against us.

To all black people and allies, we call attention to this important weekend and say, the Struggle Continues.

Young - 'End torture'!

UNITED NATIONS [UPI] — U.S. Ambassador Andrew Young called Tuesday for the United Nations to empanel a group of experts to "investigate ... the problem of torture on a worldwide basis."

Young said torture persists despite U.N. efforts to halt it.

"Torture is not used today primarily as a means of extracting information from a few hard-core opposition militants," he said, "but rather is increasingly used as a means of intimidating masses of poor and oppressed people.

"Torture is used as the leading edge of the whole system of intimidation, and such a system exists in almost every society in some form ...

Its essence is barbarism ... today increasingly associated with modern technology, unfortunately."

"We feel it would be worthwhile to consider how we might establish a group which would investigate under United Nations mandate the problem of torture on a worldwide basis — to tell us where it exists and persists ... " he said.

"It might be appropriate for the United Nations to establish a panel of distinguished nonpartisan experts ... An authoritative, comprehensive report from such a group would motivate us all, I am sure, in the direction of a new and more effective effort to eliminate this evil."

Farmers receive better support plan

WASHINGTON [UPI] — President Carter yesterday offered farm bloc congressmen a compromise more than doubling his initial proposal for farm support spending over the next four years.

He said he would veto any bill going much beyond his new offer.

"This is not a bargaining position. This is it," Agriculture Secretary Bob Bergland warned flatly in disclosing the compromise offer to reporters and farm magazine editors.

Carter's first plan for crop support rates in a farm support bill package announced in March would have cost an average of $935 million annually over the next four years, officials estimated. Bergland said the new package would cost an annual average of $2 billion.

After hearing Carter's offer, however, the Senate Agriculture Committee voted tentatively to set support target prices for corn above levels in Carter's latest proposal.

Bergland said Carter approved the compromise Monday when the agriculture secretary reported he could find little backing for the initial plan on Capitol Hill. Without a compromise, Bergland concluded, Congress would pass a measure so costly Carter would have to veto it.

Under the new plan, Bergland said the 1978 support target for wheat would be set at $2.90 a bushel instead of the originally proposed $2.60. The corn target would be set at $2 a bushel instead of $1.75; rice at 7.2 cents a pound instead of 6.75 cents, and cotton at 50 cents a pound instead of 47.5 cents.

Bergland said he believes a majority of farm bloc lawmakers will accept the new plan, because it is "close to" supports backed by congressional leaders including chairmen Thomas Foley, D-Wash., of the House Agriculture Committee and Herman Talmadge, D-Ga., of the Senate agriculture panel.

Talmadge urged a compromise, saying, "As much as we would like to get a better deal for farmers, we must yield to political realities."

Trade block fought

WASHINGTON [UPI] — President Carter will not interfere with any congressional move to loosen the trade embargo against Cuba, Sens. George McGovern and James Abourezk said yesterday.

"On the question of whether it might be helpful for Congress to take some initiative in at least a partial lifting of the embargo on food and medicine, he (Carter) said he would have no objection," McGovern told reporters.

"While he was not pushing it himself right now, he had no problems with Congress taking some leadership."

McGovern said the Senate "has better than a 50-50 chance" to take some action lifting the embargo that dates from 1961. He and Abourezk are offering such legislation.

McGovern said the outlook "is somewhat closer in the House."

"I think if we can make one long stride in removing the restriction on agricultural produce and medicine, that would open the way for negotiations for all other issues that are between us and the Cubans," McGovern said.

"He did express some concern about the level of their forces in Africa, some concern about the agitation of Cuba in Puerto Rico, and a desire on his part to see some easing off on the political prisoners in Cuba and Americans being held there," McGovern said.

Carter aide outlines energy plan

WASHINGTON [UPI] — President Carter gave members of Congress a preview yesterday of tax plans that might add 57 cents a gallon to gasoline prices by 1988 and other tough energy conservation measures that could change the life of every American.

Carter's proposals, outlined in a White House briefing by energy adviser James Schlesinger, won bipartisan praise mixed with forecasts of extreme controversy.

"It's a tough program and he's going to have trouble selling it to both Congress and the American people," said Rep. Abner Mikva, D-Ill. "But from the figures used, I'm convinced its absolutely necessary."

Aside from widespread hostility to the gasoline tax proposal, which several lawmakers said Congress probably will reject, virtually the only opposition to Carter's plan came from representatives of oil producing states who said too little emphasis was placed on expanding domestic production.

Schlesinger's congressional briefing provided the first official view of what Carter will propose today. Members of Congress said after the briefing that the plan included:

—Authority to boost gasoline taxes by a nickle a gallon during each year from 1979 through 1981 in which consumption increased by 1 per cent or more, plus authority to add another nickle during each year from 1982 through 1987 in which consumption did not decrease by 2 per cent. Carter's goal is to cut gasoline consumption by 10 per cent in the next decade. Failure to do so would drive up the price as much as 50 cents a gallon.

—A tax to raise the price of so-called "old" domestic crude oil from $5.25 per barrel to $11.28 by 1979, a move that would add another 7 cents per gallon to gasoline prices no matter what happened to consumption and also would drive up consumer costs of other petroleum products. After 1979, all domestic oil would be allowed to rise to meet the world price.

—Tax rebates, which Schlesinger did not describe, designed to return revenues from the oil and gasoline taxes to low-income Americans. The tax revenues from the higher gasoline levies alone could total $57 billion a year by 1988.

—Setting a price ceiling of $1.75 per thousand cubic feet for all natural gas, and extending federal price controls to the presently uncontrolled gas produced and sold within the same state. Prices on some intrastate gas would be rolled back from levels of over $2 as existing contracts expire.

—Placing a tax on gas-guzzling cars, but offsetting it with a tax rebate for cars that get very good gasoline mileage. Schlesinger did not spell out the size of the taxes or rebates.

—Forced conversion of industries and utilities to coal from oil and natural gas, but phased in over a long period of time so clean-air controls can be installed and coal transportation problems can be solved.

—Tax incentives for home weatherization, new building standards and mandatory appliance standards for energy efficiency.

Carter's goals for 1985, in addition to a 10 per cent curb on gasoline use, included slashing energy growth by more than half to less than 2 per cent a year and cutting the use of foreign oil in half.

Fed. agency sought for consumer affairs

WASHINGTON [UPI] — President Carter's special assistant for consumer affairs testified yesterday proposed federal Agency for Consumer Advocacy should not be feared and rather it "presents an opportunity to rebuild faith" in business and government.

"I believe that to be fearful, as some are, of this legislation is to misunderstand it," said Esther Peterson, appearing before the Senate Governmental Affairs Committee at the start of hearings on a bill to establish the consumer agency.

"The agency will have no authority to make laws, set standards, issue licenses or otherwise regulate business," she said.

"Its purpose is to improve the way in which other agencies make rules, regulations and decisions by providing an advocate for consumer interests in the decision-making process ... This legislation represents an opportunity to rebuild faith in the institution of business and government."

The bill, supported by the President and a bipartisan group of congressmen, would establish a government agency to represent the consumer before Congress and federal regulatory agencies, obtain and disseminate information important to consumers and serve as a clearinghouse for consumer complaints.

In the first day of hearings, the committee heard testimony from business, consumer and government representatives who came to support the legislation.

Mary Gardiner Jones, president of the National Consumers League, called the legislation the "single most important consumer bill to come before the Congress during the last decade."

"It provides the mechanism for ensuring that the views of our citizens are clearly heard, considered and acted upon in the federal executive branch of the government," she said.

Bottle bill battle postponed; senate compromise sought

BOSTON [UPI] — Senate action on a ban on nonreturnable bottles was postponed one day yesterday after the bill's backers did a quick headcount, and, finding an ally absent, came up at least one vote short.

When the Senate takes up the measure today, it will debate compromise amendments offered by Senate Ways and Means Committee Chairman James A. Kelly Jr., D-Oxford, who has been fighting a holding action while trying to find a measure acceptable to the container industry.

"I was short one vote and the reason I moved to postpone action was to allow Dave Locke to get back," Kelly said. Locke, a Wellesley Republican, has voted with the bill's backers.

Without Kelly's amendments, the bill would prohibit non-returnable bottles and cans and place 5-cent and 10-cent deposits on beer and soft drink containers.

Kelly offered two amendments. The first would provide a tax incentive to bottlers by giving them credits against their excise tax liabilities equal to one-tenth of one cent for each reusable container and recyclable can up to 1980. The amendment would cost the state about $1.2 million in tax revenue.

The second amendment provides retraining bottle and can workers at a cost of approximately $250,000, which Kelly said could come from federal funds.

News in Brief

Date set for auto rate hearing

BOSTON [AP] — Massachusetts Insurance Commissioner James M. Stone yesterday ordered a public hearing May 19 to consider the future of competitive rates for automobile insurance.

Stone said the hearing will determine the sufficiency and fairness of existing automobile insurance rates.

The hearing is in response to protests from angry motorists and Gov. Michael S. Dukakis about skyrocketing premiums in some parts of the state, especially Boston and a few neighboring communities.

Dockworkers end strike

NEW YORK [UPI] — Longshoremen returned to containerized cargo docks at East and Gulf coast ports yesterday after a five-day strike against major cargo shippers.

International Longshoremen's Association President Thomas Gleason said he believed a new contract could be reached without further job actions.

"Most people today don't want strikes, if they can help it," Gleason said. "If they can keep up with inflation, they want to stay on the job."

Carter rejects Nixon aid offer

WASHINGTON [UPI] — Richard Nixon has repeatedly offered to brief President Carter on foreign affairs but Carter has no plans to accept, a White House spokesman said yesterday.

Deputy Press Secretary Rex Granum said that, in the course of two or three telephone conversations with Carter, Nixon offered to "brief" the President "directly or through an intermediary" on his past experience in dealing with the Soviet Union, China and the Middle East.

Islanders may sue for seat

BOSTON [AP] — Secession-minded islanders from Nantucket and Martha's Vineyard will go to court to keep a vote in the state legislature, one of the representatives facing loss of his job said yesterday.

Rep. Terrance McCarthy, I-Edgartown, said the islanders might try to enjoin reapportionment if they get no help from the legislature in seeking an opinion on the issue from the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court.

Law to aid rape victims OK'd

BOSTON [UPI] — A bill restricting the admissibility of a woman's sexual history in a rape case was signed into law yesterday by Gov. Michael S. Dukakis.

A sponsor of the legislation, Rep. Lois Pines, D-Newton, said the new law will encourage women to report rape cases and testify in court.

Concorde knocked

[UPI] — Nearly three out of every four Concorde jets exceed legal noise limits on takeoff from London, a British advisory council said yesterday. A French official said the roar of the supersonic craft is less annoying than the buzz of a lawn mower.

French aviation circles said the noise report was "highly subjective" and denied other claims of fire and explosion hazard in the Anglo-French jet.

The British Noise Advisory Council said 72 per cent of all Concorde departures from Heathrow Airport during the plane's first year of operation exceeded noise limits set for all other commercial aircraft.

The group recommended a ban on all Concorde flights at night and said it "considers that the Concorde should not be permitted to operate from an airport where it repeatedly infringes the noise limit of that airport."

The British government exempted the Concorde from Heathrow noise limit regulations last year for an indefinite period. The Department of Trade said "there are no plans to operate Concorde at night, nor are any takeoffs planned for the evening or early morning."

Students still retain right to sue

Supreme Court allows spanking in school

WASHINGTON (AP) — The constitutional prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment does not protect public school students from spanking by teachers even though it could protect criminals from the same punishment, the Supreme Court ruled yesterday.

However, Justice Lewis F. Powell, writing for the majority in the 5-4 ruling, noted that students still have the right to sue teachers and school administrators and to bring criminal charges in state courts for spankings and other disciplinary measures.

"We are reviewing here a legislative judgment, rooted in history and reaffirmed in the laws of many states, that corporal punishment serves important educational interests," Powell wrote. "This judgment must be viewed in the light of the disciplinary problems commonplace in the schools."

In another school case, an evenly split court upheld the Philadelphia school system's practice of segregating by sex its schools for academically gifted students.

The spanking case brought a sharply worded dissent from Justice Byron R. White, in which he took issue "with the extreme view of the majority that corporal punishment in public schools, no matter how barbaric, inhumane or severe, is never limited by the Eighth Amendment."

White said also that he could not agree with treating students' rights different from prisoners' rights.

"If it is constitutionally impermissible to cut off someone's ear for the commission of murder, it must be unconstitutional to cut off a child's ear for being late to class," White said.

"Although there were no ears cut off in this case, the record reveals beatings so severe that if they were inflicted on a hardened criminal for the commission of a serious crime, they might not pass constitutional muster," he said.

White's many references to cutting off ears, using thumb screws and other inhumane treatment, prompted the usually unflappable Powell to reply: "This rhetoric bears no relation to reality ... the laws of virtually every state forbid the excessive physical punishment of school children."

Powell's opinion emphasized that common law and the laws of 21 states recognize corporal punishment in schools as a valid disciplinary tool. But the question before the court had been whether corporal punishment in schools could ever be unconstitutional.

Attorneys for the two Miami school boys who brought the case had wanted the court to decide that the Constitution protects students and to tell school officials just how far they could go in punishing students.

The court's decision upheld a ruling by the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in the case of two Miami school boys who claimed they were the victims in 1970 of a "reign of terror" at the city's Drew Junior High School.

James Ingraham and Roosevelt Andrews, both now 20, were 14-year-old students when severely paddled for what school officials called infractions of the rules.

HERE'S ONE ENGINEERING OPPORTUNITY YOU WON'T GET IN PRIVATE INDUSTRY.

If you're thinking about a career in engineering, think about this.

How many companies can offer you a nuclear submarine to operate? The answer is none. Equipment like this is available only in one place... the Navy.

The Navy operates over half the nuclear reactors in America. So our training is the broadest and most comprehensive. We start by giving you a year of advanced engineering technology. In graduate school, this would cost you thousands, but in the Navy, we pay you.

Once you're commissioned as a Nuclear Propulsion Officer, you'll earn a top salary. Over $24,000 a year after four years. And you'll be responsible for the most advanced equipment developed by man. All the Navy asks in return is that you serve for 3 years on active duty upon completion of your training.

You have only until May 15th to enroll in this year's Navy Nuclear Propulsion Candidate Program. If you are majoring in engineering, math or physical sciences, contact your placement office to find out when a Navy recruiter will be on campus. Or call toll free, 800-841-8000 (in Georgia, 800-342-5855) for more information. And if you're still a junior, ask about the Navy's NUPOC Collegiate Program, which pays you up to $6,000 during your senior year.

The Navy. When it comes to nuclear training, no one can give you the same opportunities.

NAVY OFFICER.

Combatting campus ugliness

To the Editor:

On a warm, sunny day, one of the most pleasant and relaxing spots on campus is the area which overlooks "the beach", on the south side of the Student Union building. The park benches as well as the foyer of the building provide an eating spot, a meeting spot, and a "just want to sit in the sun" spot. Its adjacency to one of the main walkways on campus renders it an ideal place for watching people, and the scene is further enhanced by the picturesque view of the Campus Pond, the Fine Arts Center and the masses of rhododendron and other trees and shrubs that harbor the area.

The attractive scenery and the delightful atmosphere of the place though are disrupted by the rundown condition of the sitting areas. The three plots supporting greenery that are surrounded by park benches are overrun with dead organic matter and weeds. The site would appear neater if these patches were raked of leaves and weeded. The remains of the dead elm trees that once thrived there should be uprooted. In addition, the ivy growing in these spots would benefit by being trimmed to the border of the enclosure rather than being allowed to run onto the pavement. A more ambitious idea would be to pull out the existing ivy and plant a handsome display of colorful flowers. As it is now, spring on campus is bursting with new vegetation, but flowers are all the more appreciated in the fall when much of the greenery is withering away.

If these tasks were carried through, the patches within the park benches would have greatly improved, but there would still remain the problem of repairing or replacing the weather-worn park benches. As they stand now, the wood is completely stripped of paint and in some places the seats are damaged. Their concrete legs are cracked and broken and there is one bench that is missing altogether.

Another cause of ugliness in the area is trash. This problem could be easily dealt with by replacing the current undersized waste receptacles with three or four fifty-gallon drums. The barrels may not stop people from littering the grounds but they would end the gross overflow of trash from the tiny baskets that are presently in the area.

There are other spots on campus that are in equal need of similar restoration, but attention should be granted to this site especially since it is a small area and it would not require a great deal of time and labor to complete the project. The area is heavily travelled which is reason enough to afford it a well tended appearance. Now is the time to start such outdoor cleaning activities, for at last the warm weather is here to stay. Tentative plans are underway to clean up the three ten-by-ten plots of ivy and possibly plant trees and-or flowers there. However, help is needed on the project. If interested, call Gloria at 546-7065 or Carol at 545-0618 [office of Coalition for Environmental Quality].

Racism and absolute power

To the Editor:

Racism is indeed a deplorable aspect of American life which the University is very, very far from having overcome. This social ill rests in large part on the arbitrary stigmatization of individuals based on general and unsubstantiated stereotypes. It should, without hesitation, be condemned when particular manifestations appear.

Having recently accepted a position at this University because it has been sensitive to the abuse of power, I am concerned that recent administrative actions have introduced a puzzling vision of a University into the process of evaluating faculty members who have already met all the standards of professional competence. Such arbitrary action brings down unexpected and unconscionable hardships on individuals and must be condemned.

The faculty must hope that those who know what it is to suffer from the arbitrary use of power will continue struggling to eliminate it.

The classic 'divide and conquer'

By GREG TARPINIAN
Collegian Staff

It's classic. The old divide and conquer strategy, it works every time. It's as clear as day on the UMass campus. The administration is doing a wonderful job of fragmenting forces which are potentially confrontational. Both students and faculty are being split amongst themselves, and each group is being pitted against the other.

On one level the administration has been quite blatant about its position. It has openly slapped the faculty right in the face by not recognizing the faculty union. It is now quite clear that the relationship between the faculty and the administration is one of employer to employee. The faculty has established a union; it is now time to fill it with a willingness to collectively battle the administration on the administration's terms. That is to say, there is no room for the polite discourse of academia any longer. Faculty members must recognize that university life is no longer what it once was; the realities of low pay and poor working conditions are not going to get better without conscious, uniform action.

We see departments on the brink of elimination, and others, due to the demands of the job market, awarded more aid. From this we see the faculty of one department in an adversarial role with that of another. We see the faculty divided, thus unable to put forth a united front against the overall attacks on the quality of life and education at UMass. Self-interest prevails at the expense of the maintenance of UMass as a quality institution of public higher learning.

Between students and faculty? What can the faculty do to halt the progressive disintegration of theirs and their families' lives? They can strike. But, a strike of a couple of days would be largely symbolic, and would probably not achieve much in the way of meaningful gains. On the other hand, a strike of one month would, while affecting UMass dramatically, be quite helpful to the faculty's cause. Nonetheless, it is infeasible. A month's deduction in salary is not a rosy sight to one with three kids, little money saved, and a paltry $15,000-year salary. What can they do? For one they can withhold student grades, thus antagonizing students and parents into action against the administration. That would quite possibly help them, but what would it do to the prospects of a future alliance between faculty and students against cuts? It would make it a positively utopian-vision. Divide and conquer.

On another level the student population is being fragmented. This is also happening primarily through departmental divisions, while there are other divisions of course. Just look at the equation which has on one side a level-budget and on the other a detraction from some departments in an attempt to build up the "job" oriented departments. Granted, the demands of the job market are pressing — but should the liberal education many of us have hoped for, and were able to get at a low cost public university, be destroyed? Hopefully not, but it looks so. Why? Is it because students in one department are not going to be willing to ally with those of another due to their different positions in terms of budget allocations? Those in good positions not willing to help those getting the shaft? There is a high probability of this happening; it's happened before. Again, self-interest, if it prevails, will do so at the expense of the maintenance of UMass as a public institution of reputable quality.

So it seems we are at the mercy of the controllers, that group which stands on firm ground; that group which has the energy and the funds to play on and utilize our shaky conditions. Students, faculty, let's recognize that we are being used; used together, against each other. We are not each others enemies. We have a common denominator. We are all groups with limited power at the university. Let's utilize what we have in a collective fight against the general cuts and attacks on our lives at UMass. Most of all students should recognize their commonality as students and go beyond the divisions which have served to split them in the past, and those which are presently in full force. United we can stand, divided we will fall.

The stagnant classroom

By VAUGHAN FREEMAN
Collegian Staff

Editor's Note: Vaughan Freeman is a junior exchange student from England.

On entering an American university classroom for the first time, the thing that struck me was the physical layout. The chairs were arranged in rows which created almost a mini-lecture theatre rather than a group discussion situation. This format, combined with the discomfort of continually swivelling around in a chair desk (in which one is only comfortable looking straight ahead) to talk to the person behind, or else talking to the back of the head of the student in front, makes inter-student discussion impossible. This results in students looking silently at their teacher, and talking only occasionally with him because they become inhibited from participating by the audience-lecturer set-up.

There is, I think, another factor which inhibits students here from expressing themselves in the classroom. Last semester, I was arguing with a friend because I believed her opinion on a topic was untenable. Finally, she ran out of reasons with which to support her argument yet stuck with her view without admitting that the basis for her belief was not rational but prejudiced. It turned out her argument came from a class, and she stuck blindly with what she had been taught not because she understood her argument but because, in her own words:

"If I cannot believe my teachers then who can I believe?"

She believed her teachers to be omniscient, and did not know how to question or refute them. The teacher spoke and my friend listened. The American undergraduates question neither themselves nor their teachers. The result is stagnation. Being no longer able to question or think means an individual is not understanding what is being taught. Given such minds, it is of no account how brilliant the professor is or how timeless are the truths being expounded, for such truths and brilliance will simply be blindly assimilated as prejudices and will not be understood at all.

Having found myself in the High School situation of the first paragraph, I sat down and waited while students drifted in and made for the back of the room (as far as possible from the professor they had all come to see). Fifteen minutes after the class was due to begin, a middle-aged lady entered who leaned against the only desk in the class which was at the front of the room. She did not apologize for being late but did apologize for the absence of the professor who should have taken the class. He had decided that since the first meeting would be a mere formality, he need not turn up or even supply a course outline. Our teacher for the day read the first half of a short story by Hawthorne and gave the class twenty minutes to supply an ending from our imaginations. She asked for no critical appraisal of the piece she had just read.

The course I was attending was not creative writing and, aside from being an interesting though superfluous sociological experiment, I could see no purpose to this task. I challenged her reasons for the assignment and after a heated discussion, she agreed with my evaluation of the exercise which was that if twenty people are asked to write on the same theme, then twenty different papers will result. Although heated, both the teacher and I were enjoying and learning from our exchange. We had almost said the last word when the ability of the American student not only to not think, but to not care was demonstrated in a classic manner. A fellow student sitting in the only row in front of me bawled out:

"So what does it matter anyway?"

For me, anyone who is so uninvolved and unthinking in regard to the exchange of ideas and the manifestation of that exchange in literature has no place in any university.

The truly disillusioning part of the above was, for me, that the students were participating by their inertia in the stifling of their own ideas and their own intelligence. The students in this, and in many other classes I have since been involved with, had no mental curiosity or energy. They have no wish to challenge the ideas of others or to assert the validity of their own ideas. They passively accept answers from teachers upon whom has been bestowed the authority of the Delphic Oracle, without even knowing how to ask the questions which precede the answers they are being fed.

I do not feel the need to cite innumerable examples for the above is, I feel, typical of one aspect of UMass teaching. It seems the main priority at UMass is for the student to be able to accurately regurgitate whatever he is fed by the teacher and the system that backs that teacher. The subject matter is irrelevant; what one learns is to feed back what everyone has been fed. Learning answers by rote rather than learning how to ask questions and aiming for a degree with a good average and vaguely hoping to learn something on the way, do not seem worthy criteria on which to found one's education. Perhaps at graduate level, the situation will have improved, but how old do UMass students have to be before they learn how to take the responsibility of thinking for themselves?

Believe it or not

The UMass Department of Historical Accuracy proudly presents:

GREAT MOMENTS IN THE HISTORY OF UMASS
The Arrival Of The Sunderland Bus

April 15, 1977: It was a great feeling of relief for the 12,000 students who were waiting at the bus stop for the long awaited Sunderland Bus. Bus schedules which had prompt arrival times printed boldly across a pink sheet, were burned in protest after the angry mob had waited two days for a bus that was supposed to arrive every ten minutes.

By the evening of the third day, red cross volunteers arrived via the campus shuttle, Orchard Hill and North Amherst buses to pass out coffee and donuts.

The UMass bus driver who was in the driver's seat of the Sunderland bus when it did arrive was heard to respond to student complaints:

"Don't bitch at me, you fools! What makes you think I care! Get off my ass! You don't pay my salary!"

Needless to say, there was much crowding-on because of the fear that another Sunderland bus wouldn't arrive for at least another week. Happily, the driver was able to get all 12,000 students on.

Unfortunately, none of them were able to get off. If you care to see them they're at the Fine Arts Center, as an exhibit.

Driver Liberation

The first meeting ever of the "people who pick up hitch-hikers" liberation front met today in the front seat of a Buick LeSabre to discuss their demands of the hitchhikers they pick up.

It seems that hitch-hikers have been shirking their responsibilities toward the people who pick them up, so this movement has gathered to recommend some suggestions to those who do hitch-hike:

1) Take showers
2) Don't slam the damn door
3) Ask, before you bring a cigarette into the car
4) Don't always end a ride with, "have a nice day". Think of something new and unusual. And finally,
5) drivers, especially on long trips, usually like to get high. If you got something, let 'em know.

The Astrological Forecast that Came True

Can you imagine the surprise of one Mr. Anthony Loafaskelli when, on March 26, 1977, his astrological forecast went exactly as predicted by Bluebird on WMUA.

As the day began, Loafiskelli listened to the 8:30 AM astrology report:

"Today there'll be a lot of breathing and walking and you'll find yourself talking everytime you have something to say. You'll feel good sometimes and bad sometimes and you'll find yourself being near the people around you.

"This morning, Pluto, the planet of nose bleeds and sinus conditions will collide with Jupiter, planet of the time released cold capsule. The result will be the largest cosmic head cold ever recorded.

"Later on in the day, Mars will form a triangle with the library causing the Jewish population to join hands and sing "Hava Nagila"."

Sure enough, Mr. Loafaskelli found all this to be true and he even had a good time dancing around the library. However, sneezing stars kept him awake for most of the night.

A Man Talks to a Woman

Amazing as this sounds, on September 15, 1976, a man and a woman did actually sit down and speak to each other as people. Neither person talked about "men" or "women" in general or discussed roles or stereotypes. They didn't even mention the politics of liberation. They just talked, like the two people they were.

By the way, in case you haven't noticed, the Collegian has been advertising for more bizarre and unusual ads for their personal section. The ones they have now seem to lack the kind of good all American perversion that can be found in the Valley Advocate (bless its little printing press). So, as an after-thought, I'd like to give this paper the first of what will probably be many bizarre personal ads.

"Man with cow looking for woman with stool. Purpose; A milk job."

The alienation syndrome

It usually hits me when I start to study at ten o'clock each night or on a weekend when there are those academic things to be done that I just don't feel like doing or even at a party when I can't be surprised by anything that happens anymore and I can't find any purpose in anything that happens any more. And I guess that sums it up — I just can't find any purpose in anything. I feel removed — alienated.

It's the alienation syndrome, the newest fad on college campuses today. Boredom, lack of excitement and enthusiasm — apathy. At first I thought it was just something inside of me — something like sophomore slump, but then I found out everyone felt the same.

"This school is so large. You get lost in it," a friend of mine with similar symptoms said. "You can't find anyone around like you and the red-tape and impersonability really bring you down, slow you down and all your motivation is drained and lost."

But it's not just here at UMass. It's everywhere. A woman from Smith said to me, "Hey, these days I just look out the window and can't get anything done. Just wished I had had more fun and hadn't booked so hard because now I just don't see any purpose in it. I mean, where am I going after this and what does what I'm doing now have to do with whatever it is?"

The worst case seems to be at Amherst where a friend of mine told me "everyone is so alienated that they don't even know what they're alienated from!"

And so it goes on and on — college just isn't as much fun, it's boring, what am I doing here, I feel alienated — why?

The biggest alienation is alienation from the real world. College life is removed from reality and the only responsibilities are academic — and academia land is definitely far, far removed from the real pace of the everyday world. "It's a total flight away from the world," a woman from Mt. Holyoke said to me. "I mean, we study, but it's not really all that hard and there any kind of responsibility stops. We just play after that."

We play the fantasy life of a college co-ed and what does this have to do with normal life? It's a twenty-four hour thing, stuck on campus, our books, just the buildings remind us of academia. And no matter what you do, you aren't affecting anything.

Then there is an alienation with your expectations of what college should be. Your conceptions before you came here? — heh, the sixties and the peace movement, and the concern with real life issues. It's a feeling, a spirit running deep through everyone, bringing everyone together for a cause. We heard about it on television or from mom and dad at the supper table. We wanted it so. But the movement was dead by the time we arrived and all that's left are a few dents slowly smoothing out with time. The faith is gone. There's nothing for you to grab onto — and you feel alienated.

Another alienation is with yourself. You can't seem to affect anything in your life just now. You feel stagnant. You seem to be going nowhere and there is nothing you can do about it. You have just a fuzzy goal, but reaching that goal is so far away. You seem to be vascillating — wondering so much about what you want because it is so far away.

Another alienation is with the future. You can't be surprised by it anymore. You know what it is — that regimented middle aged existence. How boring! How stagnant! Once you make it, that's it. No more surprises ahead. You've seen it with your parents. You just want to keep the heart of a twelve-year-old, a free-spirit and keep on working toward and believing in never-never land. But you know all along, you already know there is no such thing as never-never land. You feel just like a forty year old with no more surprises to look forward to.

The last cause for alienation is alienation from a culture. You can't be a hippy anymore because everyone is. You can't be different anymore, because everyone else is different. You want to be "counter-culture", away from "culture" and what do you find? Counterculture is the culture. What can you do? How can you avoid from being seeped into the masses without being noticed?

And what can you do, in any case, to stop this feeling inside, this alienation inside? If I really knew I probably wouldn't be writing this but doing some homework, able to work without this feeling of alienation inside distracting me. I don't know, perhaps it's time to find living possible on another planet? Perhaps it's time to go out and kill all our teachers?

Or maybe it's time to just appreciate this four-year vacation and enjoy whatever Machiavelli and Plato have to say. Maybe it's just time to forget the sixties ever happened and enjoy the radicalism of this era. Perhaps it's just time to forget all together about the future and stop feeling like forty-year-olds. Perhaps it's just time to forget all together the carefreeness of childhood and stop wanting to be like twelve-year-olds. Perhaps it's just time to stop trying to be different and just be ourselves. I think perhaps it's time now that I can get some homework done because I don't feel that feeling of alienation anymore. Maybe what I've got to say here will help you, too. Life is short. Just remember that.

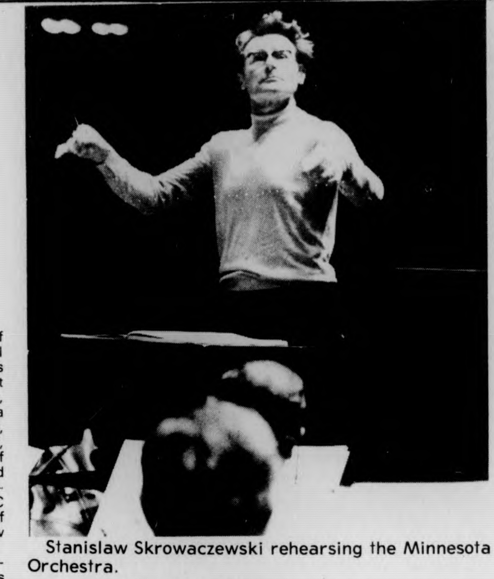
THE ARTS

Minn. Orch.. at FAC

By MARK LECCESE
Below The Salt Staff



Stanislaw Skrowaczewski rehearsing the Minnesota Orchestra.

By summertime, the University of Massachusetts Arts Council will have brought three of the country's premiere orchestras to perform at the Fine Arts Center. In October, the Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared; the Chicago Symphony, under the baton of Sir Georg Solti, is due May 10. Last night, one of the country's most under-rated orchestras, the Minnesota Orchestra, appeared in the FAC conducted by its music director of seventeen years, Stanislaw Skrowaczewski.

Stanislaw, a Polish born conductor and composer, wrote his first symphonic work at the age of five, and at eleven debuted as a concert pianist. An injury to his hands during a WW II bombing raid ended his career as a pianist, and in 1958, he conducted his first American Orchestra, the Cleveland, then under the direction of George Szell.

Last night's program began with the Overture to Il Turco in Italia by the Italian operatic composer Giacchino Rossini. The piece featured solo french horn and trumpet section, and although the brasses were a bit off, the Overture served as a nice opener.

Next on the program was the Beethoven Symphony No. 2, op. 36. This is one of the least performed of the Beethoven Nine. It was composed between the Haydnish First and the revolutionary Third, and has a few elements of both. Skrowaczewski handled it very well, conducting it very rapidly and keeping it together. The second movement was slow and also very well done, and both the conductor and orchestra gave a fine interpretation of this symphony.

After an intermission featuring the University Brass Choir, who were applauded by the Orchestra members after their fanfares, the last half of the program featured the Scheherazade, Symphonic Suite, op. 35, by Nikolay Rimsky-Korsakov. It is a musical narrative of the sea and sea-ports, written in four fluent movements.

Each movement features a violin cadenza and solo with harp that were performed by the first desk player with a rare brilliance that helped the audience forget the mistakes some of the other orchestra members were making. Her tone was charming as well as exacting, and she played the long, final and very high pitched tone of the last movement with an almost unerring grace. The tone filled the large, concrete hall until it was something much more grand and amazing than a simple violin tone. This is no easy feat, as the concrete walls of the FAC Concert Hall often make high pitched noted ring rather unnervingly.

Skrowaczewski conducted the Rimsky-Korsakov with a fluid grace that added to the piece's suggestion of the sea. After he rushed through the Beethoven, it appeared that he might have been, like Toscanini, fond of quick tempos. But in the Scheherzade, he conducted with versatility, particularly in his tempos.

Thanks to the University Arts Council, this University is very fortunate in the fact that we are presented, five minutes from the dorms, an orchestra of the calibre of the Minnesota Orchestra, 1500 miles from their home. When was the last time you were in Minnesota?

'Play day' begins today at NOPE

"Any Way to Play Day" (AWTPD) opens today at NOPE Gym with a 9 a.m. registration and kick-off session. AWTPD has been developed by students and faculty of the Physical Education Program department and is being offered free of charge to students.

The program has been designed to give students and faculty the opportunity to engage in new activities, to learn from each other and to share some common experiences. There are six day sessions, each is 45 minutes, and has at least four program options. There will be more than 24 programs for students and faculty to choose from.

The morning sessions begin at 9:00 with free registration and continue until noon. A lunch and recreation break is scheduled from noon to 1:30. Afternoon sessions begin at 1:30 and end at 4:15.

The program resumes at 7 p.m. with a large group "None Game" session on NOPE fields. At 8 p.m. the activity will move inside NOPE Gym for dancing, swimming, volleyball, basketball and other play activities.

Events programs will be handed out during registration.

Your Birthday by Stella Wilder

Wednesday, April 20 — Born today, you are a deeply sincere person. You would never promise what you are not absolutely you can deliver at the appointed time and place. You would never voice -- or suggest in any way -- opinions which you do not in all honesty hold. Never one to deliberately deceive, you go wrong -- when you do go wrong -- because you do not know any other way to go and are convinced that the way you are going is the right one. There are times when you choose to keep your feelings to yourself -- but you always announce the fact of your reticence ahead of time. You never allow others to believe that you have no opinion at all where you are merely holding one in reserve. You are always ready to deliver a judgment in the sense that you possess a judgment. Whether or not you wish to make judgments of a highly and adversely critical nature is something else again.

You have a tendency to take yourself too seriously. What you might take as a simple goal, you may well take as a mission. What you might interpret as normal support for a given cause, you may well interpret as a carte blanche permit to do your own thing in your own way as long and as extensively as you wish. Your inclination to categorize everything, including people, could lead you into considerable difficulty with your personal relationships. People do not like being put into pigeon holes; they are bound to let you know one way or another of their resentment.

Yours is basically a passionate nature, though you will learn early in life to control your emotions very well. Indeed, during your adult years, you may hide your responses of frustration, anger, hurt or shock so well that even your closest associates may think of you as being distant at best, callous at worst.

Thursday, April 21

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) — If you are as wise as you are observing today, you will be able to make both spiritual and material profit by day's end.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) — There is more than a little risk involved in opportunity today. Make sure you can handle the former if you want to grasp the latter.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) — Morning surprises may leave you a little the worse for wear this afternoon. Make an effort to explain nuances to the very young.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) — A defeatest attitude will gain you nothing in the long run and considerable trouble in the immediate future. Try the optimistic approach.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) — A golden opportunity may prove quite leaden if you attempt to take hold of it. Disregard warnings at your peril.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) — A contribution to the community is in order today. Deliver whatever goods have been ordered -- and then some!

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) — A self-improvement day, especially for the Scorpio with plans for the exploring of new horizons in the near future.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) — Much that is worth achieving is not particularly difficult to attain. Don't believe everything you read or hear -- or even see!

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) — Support workers' efforts to improve the situation on the employment scene. Difficulties fade as enterprises progress.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) — Progress lies in effort put forth within the confines of your own domestic circle. Loved ones bring new advantages with them.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) — Slow down when and if you to feel "pushed." This is an excellent time to introduce others to your favorite activity.

ARIES (March 21-April 19) — Affection, and a lot of it, is the solution to your problem. Don't hesitate to offer help to one in need of a friendly boost.

Sox batter Tigers

BOSTON [UPI] — Rick Miller celebrated his 29th birthday last night by driving home three runs with three hits and scoring twice, while Rick Burleson added three hits and two RBIs in a 17-hit Boston attack which provided the Red Sox with an 11-3 victory over the Detroit Tigers.

Miller brought in Boston's fourth and winning run in a six-run second inning with a double that chased Tiger starter and loser Ray Bare, now 0-2. Burleson greeted reliever Jim Crawford with a two-run homer to cap the inning. Butch Hobson also doubled home two runs in the inning.

Miller singled in two more runs in the third and Jim Rice contributed three hits as every Boston starter collected at least one hit.

Bowlers finish up seasons

The UMass men's and women's bowling teams competed in their last Tri-State tournament of the year Sunday.

The women's team, comprised of Beth Schneider, Amanda Garcia, Jane O'Neil, Fran Griffin, Patty Melanson, and Karen James captured first place with a total pinfall of 2483, led by Melanson with a fine 542 series and Garcia, who rolled a 210 game and a 502 series.

Central Connecticut State came in second with a 2464 team total, and Lowell University placed third with a 2444. The team event was very close with the final outcome decided in the last frame.

Doubles honors were awarded to Griffin and Melanson, who averaged 190 for the event. They rolled an 1139, which was the highest doubles score of the year.

Griffin bowled a 596 series with an individual high game of 257, which won her the high game of the year plaque. She also won the singles event in the tournament.

Melanson won all-events with a 1085 series. She bowled two 202 games to clinch the top spot. Garcia and James placed second in the doubles with a 1068.

The women's team also captured top honors for the year in the Tri-State League. James led the league with a high average of 168. Garcia received the second place trophy for her 167 average.

The men's team didn't do as well as the women but managed to finish third in the Tri-State League for the season. The men failed to capture second place by three match points. Cornell University came in second place while the University of Lowell took the league championship.

Rich Rosenthal had a fine day placing second in the singles event with a 596 series. He posted scores of 201, 201, and 204 during the day. Mitch Foreman bowled a 208 while Paul Stutzman and Roger Norcross shot a 203 and 200 respectively. The other two members of the men's team are Mike Berard and Dave Tursky.

Freshman Berard returned last week from Reno, Nevada where he competed in the ACU-I nationals for individuals. He was one of 32 collegiate bowlers across the nation to compete. As the youngest bowler in the national finals he placed 20th.

The men's team had a very fine season considering that there was only one returning member from last year's squad. The future looks promising as the team had three outstanding freshmen (Berard, Foreman, and Rosenthal). Add that trio to newcomers Norcross, Tursky, Jeff Nelson, and Rich LaCross and it shows a team which has an excellent chance of being one of the top powers in New England next year. The women's team is already the best in New England.

Ruggers continue winning ways

By RICHARD MOORE
Collegian Staff

The UMass rugby football club continued its winning ways last weekend as the B and C sides split two games Saturday in Vermont, while the A and C sides swept home contests Sunday.

The UMass B side couldn't put any offense together in an 18-6 loss to the University of Vermont A side. The Minutemen were late for the start of the game and were flat without a warm-up. UMass actually started the game three men short and when it rushed onto the field Vermont took advantage of the confusion and scored the first try.

Two Andy Middleton goal kicks had the Minutemen in the game at 12-6, but Vermont was in constant control of the ball and UMass never really threatened the Catamount lead.

"They were just out-classed," UMass coach "Doc" Laurence said. "Vermont's forwards were stronger and we didn't win much line out ball."

The C side, led by wing Eddie Bender's two penalty kicks, won a hard-fought defensive battle, 6-3 against the Vermont B side.

"Neither team could get much offense going," Laurence said, "but scrum half Rich Terzian and fly half Paula Cabot did a good job for us."

The A side scored an important 15-4 win Sunday over Wesleyan, making them eligible for the championship round of the New England Rugby Football Union Tournament, which they will host May 14 and 15.

The first half ended in a frustrating 0-0 tie. Frustrating for the Minutemen, because they were constantly on the attack, but every time they got in scoring range a dropped ball or bad pass brought them up short.

"We were going through them like a hot knife through butter," Laurence said, "but we fell apart when we got near that goal line."

At the 10 minute mark of the second half Wesleyan grabbed a 4-0 lead when UMass fullback Jeff Stefani failed to cover a short kick into the in goal area.

"That score really seemed to wake us up," Laurence said, "because we came out firing after that."

One minute later Andy Sirica's five yard try on a pass from forward Dave Whaley and Hugh Chester-Jones conversion had the Minutemen up 6-4. From then on the game was played in Wesleyan's end of the field.

A Chester-Jones penalty kick made it 9-4 and Whaley scored at the final whistle to wrap up the victory.

"We were clearly the better club," Laurence said, "but we couldn't finish off a lot of our attacks."

The UMass C side, bolstered by the addition of several B side players, rolled to an impressive 24-0 win over the Springfield City Club.

Number eight Paul Chakoian covered a kick by wing Jim Toohey and then Andy Middleton took a Chuck Momny pass, found a seam in the defense, and went 60 yards for the try and a 10-0 lead. UMass got the ball back and Stan Laboda faked a pitch to Toohey, found an alley to the inside and romped 35 yards for the score and a 16-0 halftime lead.

"The ball handling and transfers were excellent," Laurence said, "they were getting the ball out to the wing better than the A side."

In the second half fly half Cabot fell on a bad Wesleyan kick for a try and wing John Kanter raced in from 35 yards out.

"All in all it was a good weekend," Laurence said.

Scrum Scraps — A-side hooker Mark McCabe and forward Dave Whaley invited to New England side trials — "They both have a good chance of making that side," Laurence said. — UMass' only female rugby player, Cabot, showed good passing ability in Springfield game.

At any price you can afford to be choosy.

Because the value of every diamond is determined by four characteristics (cut, color, clarity and carat weight), you can always use these qualities to your best advantage.

Perhaps you're attracted by the grandeur of a large diamond. Well, sometimes a large stone can cost the same as a smaller one. Simply because it has a little more color. Or a delicate birthmark hidden inside.

On the other hand, you may feel size isn't the most important quality. Then you could choose a diamond that's small, but perfectly cut to sparkle with an icy-white elegance.

In any case, you'll be able to find one to suit your personality. Because each one is an individual, with its own combination of characteristics. And you can use these qualities any way you wish, to help you decide what's precisely right for you.

But the important thing to remember is to buy a diamond engagement ring you'll be happiest with. You'll be sharing it for a lifetime with someone you love.

And for that reason alone, you should be choosy.

A diamond is forever.

Prices shown represent retail quotations for these specific rings (enlarged for detail). Your jeweler has many diamonds to choose from and can give you the best guidance. De Beers Consolidated Mines, Ltd.

Gazelles romp past Smith, 17-2

By NICK KOTSOPOULOS

NORTHAMPTON — Julie Hall, Carrie Nickerson and Nancy O'Neil scored four goals apiece in leading the UMass women's lacrosse to a convincing, 17-2 victory over Smith College yesterday afternoon at the Smithies' home field.

The win was the first of the season for coach Frank Garahan's Gazelles, after they opened with a 9-9 tie against Northeastern University last Saturday.

The contest was never in doubt from the outset, as the Minutewomen's aggressiveness in the early going caught Smith off guard.

"Our team was really hungry for this one," Garahan said. "We were a little disappointed by our performance in the game against Northeastern because we felt that we should have beaten them."

The Minutewomen built up a commanding, 10-1 lead after the first half, as the Gazelles' tight defense play and textbook offense befuddled the outclassed Smithies.

"We did a lot of good things in the first half," Garahan pointed out. "We went a lot more to the fast-break offense, which is a very important part of our game.

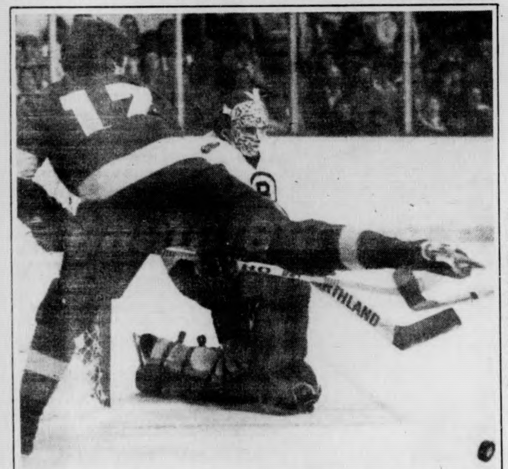
"Against Northeastern on Saturday afternoon, we weren't able to get our fastbreak into gear and it certainly effected our goal production."

While Hall, Nickerson and O'Neil were putting the points on the scoreboard in the first half for the Gazelles, UMass goalie Mary Murray had little trouble keeping Smith off of the scoreboard, as the Smithies were only able to get three shots on goal in the half.

In the second half, the Gazelles picked up where they left off offensively as they scored seven more goals, while limiting Smith to only one.

"We played the second half with a lot of reserves," Garahan said, "and it was good to see that our offensive production didn't let down that much, although I think we let up slightly defensively in the half."

O'Neil was the team's leading scorer as she had four goals and three assists, while Hall and Nickerson had four goals and two assists apiece. Evie Sneeden had three goals amd two assists and Cindy Hartstone registered a pair of goals.



Bruins goalie Gerry Cheevers makes a save on a shot fired close in by Kings' Tommy Williams. The Kings' converted when they had to though and defeated the Bruins 3-1 last night at the Garden. Next game is in L.A. on Friday night. (UPI)

Shorthanded netmen nail HC

By MIKE SMOLENS
Collegian Staff

The UMass men's tennis team yesterday defeated Holy Cross 8-1 in Worcester, despite the absence of the Minutemen's number one singles player Adam Rosen.

Rosen, who was expected to play today, missed the bus to Holy Cross, according to UMass coach Bill Brown. Brown juggled the line-up by moving his singles players up one position to cover for the missing Rosen.

Brown, perturbed by Rosen's absence, said there was "no explanation" as to why Rosen missed the bus.

The Minutemen had a tough time with the Crusaders, despite the near clean sweep. In addition to being thrust into higher singles slots, the Minutemen were not at their best.

"It was an off day," Brown said. "Fortunately. we had an off day against a team like Holy Cross.

It was not an off day for Brown's "supersub", Steve Heyl, who filled in at sixth singles. Heyl, in his first singles match of the season, showed no signs of rustiness as he posted a convincing 6-2, 6-0 win over Kevin Koellner of Holy Cross.

"Heyl was spectacular," Brown said. "He was really strong. He did a great job for us."

Alan Green, taking Rosen's spot at first singles, "has looked a lot better," according to Brown. Green survived one match point in the third set against HC's Bill Egan and held on to take the match 6-3, 3-6, 7-5.

Ricky Sharton, UMass' third singles player, has had his problems this season and today was no exception. Sharton went down fighting to Paul Henchy 2-6, 6-3, 7-5. Sharton, who played fifth singles last year, is having trouble adjusting to his promotion and is now 1-3 on the season.

Barnaby Kalan and Jimmy Barnhart, playing second and fourth singles for UMass, played steady tennis, according to Brown, and beat their opponents in two sets. Kalan defeated Tom Murry 6-3, 6-4, while Barnhart swept past Bob Scully 6-0, 6-4.

Fifth singles player Alan Staple had little trouble in his 6-2, 6-4 win over HC's Jim McCann.

The Minutemen, having clinched the match in the singles, went on to win the three doubles matches. Green and Barnhart defeated Egan and Henchy 6-3,3-6,6-2; Kalan and Staple nipped Murry and McCann 6-2,3-6,7-6 (5-3 tie breaker); Heyl and Sharton 6-1,4-6,6-3 over Scully and Rick Raidy.

Duffers putter to 2nd place

By BOB HASKELL
Collegian Staff

Dartmouth's number one golfer, Joe Henley, fired a sparkling two-under-par 69 yesterday, as the Big Green edged past the UMass contingent by a total of six strokes in a match played at The Orchards golf course in South Hadley. The Amherst College golf team finished an arm-weary 27 strokes behind the Minutemen.

UMass coach Fan Gaudette wasn't exactly thrilled with the results, but he saw some reason for optimism after the day's work.

"I was disappointed and yet not disappointed in our performance today," he said. "Bobby Sanderson (79), Jim McDermott (75), and Flint Lincoln (76), our top three players, all had trouble on the last few holes. If they had parred in, we would have lost by only one stroke. When the other team throws a 69 at you like Henley did today, that's not bad."

Chuck Dempsey played extremely well for the Minutemen. He shot a strong 79 while playing in the sixth position, behind Sanderson, McDermott, Lincoln, Billy Locke (87) and Mark Powers (84). Since these matches are best five out of seven affairs, Dempsey provided some unexpected assistance for UMass' effort that achieved a 393 stroke total for the afternoon.

With nary a moment to recover their breaths, the Minutemen will face off against the Boston College and Holy Cross duffers in a home match that is scheduled to begin tomorrow morning at 11:00.

According to coach Gaudette, the Minutemen will continue to experiment with new faces in an attempt to put together their best possible squad for the New England Championships on May 5-6.

"I'll be playing Vic Lahteine for sure on Thursday," he said, "and maybe one or two other guys. We have to experiment a little bit if we're gonna peak for the New Englands. That's the one we're really gearing for. As of now, it looks like Sanderson, McDermott, and Lincoln are solid. Dempsey may make that four, we'll have to see."

The Minutemen fielded a squad that included three freshman. Besides Lincoln and Powers that also included former District III schoolboy champ, Chris Hales, who was a little shaky while posting an 86.

The Salem State hackers were originally slated to play yesterday, but were unable to attend due to some scheduling difficulties.

The golfers face a tight schedule of events from here on in. After Thursday, they face the prospect of participating in the Salem State Tournament (April 24-25) and the Mass. State Tournament (April 28 before the New Englands.

Batsmen sweep twinbill

By JOHN LOWNEY
Collegian Staff

As a team labeled "good pitch, no hit" at the beginning of the season, the UMass baseball team continues to surprise. Yesterday's 11-0, 10-7 sweep of Dartmouth here is further proof that the Minutemen have more power than anyone expected.

UMass combined clutch power hitting and aggressive base running with some sloppy Dartmouth fielding to overwhelm the Big Green, as all nine starters crossed the plate in game one, and eight of nine scored in the second contest.

In each game the Minutemen exploded for one big inning against the unimpressive Dartmouth pitchers. A seven-run fourth inning buried the Big Green in game one, while UMass came from behind in game two with a six-run third to take a lead it never lost.

Once again freshman Mike McEvilly was the UMass batting hero. His two singles in the first game started and finished the fourth inning rally, and he had three hits, including a drag bunt single, and scored three runs in game two.

Tom Nigro and Jerry Erb combined for the four hit shutout in the first game. Nigro had his usual fine control in breezing through the first four innings. Erb then baffled Dartmouth with his big curve ball, striking out the first four batters he faced.

Ed Skribiski provided the hurlers with all the runs they needed as he smashed the first Brad Blair pitch over the 375 foot mark in left center field. Charley Ciccone's two run double and a Dale Stone run-producing single built the lead to 4-0 after three innings.

McEvilly then started the bizarre fourth inning by nearly decapitating hurler Blair with his line shot to center. Leo Kalinowski walloped a double to right center before Ciccone came through with a long homer.

Skribiski and Bob Alves singles, a Paul Abramowicz sacrifice fly, and a Jim Cullen triple which bounced off the top of the left field wall accounted for three more runs before McEvilly's single up the middle second Cullen to finish the UMass scoring.

Game two lacked the pitching artistry which Nigro and Erb had provided in the first affair. Lefty Dave Stoller, who was effective against the Holyoke Millers, made his first start of the season.

Stoller, who had originally planned to redshirt this year, was the victim of some bad bounces in a five-run Dartmouth second inning. Although Chico Denison, and Sandy Emery had solid hits for the Big Green, a weak opposite field double, a bad hop single and two Mike Stockley errors were very damaging.

The Minutemen came right back in the third, scoring six with only one solid hit. Stockley and Skribiski walked. McEvilly puched a single to center to score Stockley. Dartmouth pitcher Kevin Chase's pickoff throw went into center field to set up a sacrifice fly from Alves and John Czerapowicz's RBI double.

Dartmouth bounced back against Erb, who replaced Stoller in the wild second inning, as the senior righthander lost the control he had in game one. Chicopee's Gary Masse, Dartmouth's leading hitter, knocked in Emery with a solid double.

Doug Welenc relieved Erb in the fifth. Except for a solo homer by center fielder Denison, the freshman was untouchable, as he struck out four in picking up the save for Erb.

McEvilly provided the winning run in the fourth as he beat out his bunt, stole second on an attempted pickoff play, advanced to third on a Czerapowicz infield hit, and scored on Stone's ground out to second.

"Maybe we're getting it together," said assistant coach Jeff McKay. "The way we've been off and on this season, it's good to win two."

The double UMass win left former Red Sox Tony Lupien's Dartmouth team with a 7-10 record. The Big Green, much improved after a disastrous 6-34 slate last year, have beaten Providence twice and split with Holy Cross since returning from their southern trip.

UMass can now look forward to Fairfield and Maine, two of the top New England teams. "Today's two wins should pick us up a little," said head coach Bergquist.

"It's good to take two straight from a Division I team," he continued. "It should build our confidence for Fairfield and Maine."

Kings still alive, as B's falter

BOSTON [UPI] — Bob Murdoch was credited with an early third period goal that glanced off the skate of Boston defenseman Brad Park last night to give Los Angeles a 3-1 win over the Bruins and keep the Kings alive in their Stanley Cup quarter-final series.

Los Angeles, now trailing the best-of-seven series three games to two, hosts the Bruins Friday night in game no. 6.

Mike Murphy added an empty net goal with one second to play for the final margin. Kings goalie Rogie Vachon, showing his acrobatic talents that were lacking in the first four games of the series, stopped 39 shots.

With one minute elapsed in the third period of a 1-1 game, Murdoch took a 15 foot shot that was blocked by Boston goalie Gerry Cheevers. The rebound rolled back in front of the net, hit Park's skate and skidded into the goal as Park tried to swipe the disc away.

Dave Schultz' first period power play goal stood up for a 1-0 Los Angeles lead until Rick Middleton tied the game 13:42 into the middle period.

The Bruins' Gregg Sheppard had just hit the goal post on a 2-on-1 break when LA's Don Kozak skated down ice, and took a 35-footer that Cheevers deflected onto the stick of Schultz, standing at the right post.

Minutewoman Heidi Dickson watches the ball bounce away after being hit by a pitch in yesterday's first game of a doubleheader. The Minutewomen reached base with regularity in the opener, but the bats cooled off in the nightcap. (Staff photo by Jay Saret)

Softballers fly by Owls

By MEL WEBSTER
Collegian Staff

The UMass softball team continued its winning ways yesterday as it defeated the Owls of Westfield State in a doubleheader, 17-0 and 3-2.

The first game saw the Minutewomen break out of their hitting blues as they rapped out 12 hits. Sue Peters and Gail Carter had three hits each, and Sue DiRocco and Carol Bruce had two apiece. Bruce and Peters both hit home runs while Rhonda McManus and Pat Oski tripled.

The win was the sixth in a row without a loss for the Minutewomen, and the first win for pitcher Gail Carter. The freshman allowed only five hits while striking out two and walking two. The shutout was Carter's first-ever.

The Minutewomen scored 9 runs in the first inning, sending 13 batters to the plate. Included in the first inning onslaught were three singles, a double, three walks, a double steal, and two Westfield errors.

Carter worked out of a jam in the third inning, as the first two Westfield batters singled. She then got the next two batters on flyouts, and got the third on a groundout.

The batswomen got four more runs in the third inning, with the big blow being Bruce's two-run homer. They then added four more in the fourth, three of them coming on Peter's blast to left.

Both teams made wholesale changes late in the game as the verdict was no longer in doubt, and played evenly for the last three innings.

Westfield left seven runners on base and the Minutewomen left five. The Owls made four errors while the Minutewomen played errorless ball.

The second game was the exact opposite of the first games as the Minutewomen bats became cold again. "The bats were hot the first game but they cooled off fast in the second game," coach Dianne Thompson said.

UMass managed only five hits in the second game while Westfield had eight. The Minutewomen were helped greatly by nine walks off the Owls' pitcher.

Winning pitcher Peters pitched out of jams in the first two innings, but in the fourth Janet LeClerc hit a two-run homer for Westfield to put the Owls ahead.

The Minutewomen came right back to tie the score in the bottom of the fourth. Peters bunted for a hit and scored when the throw by the Westfield pitcher went into right field. Pat Oski then followed with a long homerun to center field.

The game remained tied until the bottom of the seventh. Cheryl Meliones walked and stole second. She went to third when Elaine Howle reached on an error and scored on a Gail Matthews single over a drawn in outfield.

"The second game was too close for comfort," Thompson said.

"I'm glad we won the first game by so much, because we got to practice some things that we are going to have to do in order to beat Springfield," Thompson added.

Westfield left nine runners on base in the game. The win for Peters was her third, and she improved her ERA to 1.33. The freshwoman hurler struck out four and walked two in the complete game victory.

"We got out of jams by playing good defense today," Thompson said. She added that she was pleased by the baserunning again today.

Nation to feel gas pains

WASHINGTON [UPI] — President Carter urged Congress last night to put Americans on a painful, mandatory energy conservation diet including taxes that could bring $1-a-gallon gasoline and add $2,488 to the price of gas guzzling cars.

In a sober, nationally televised address to a joint session of Congress, Carter said Americans must be forced to save energy because they are unlikely to give up wasteful habits voluntarily.

He called it "a thankless job" but said the alternative is that "crisis... could overwhelm us."

Carter's 30-minute speech — the first of his presidency before Congress — presented the grand design for a national energy policy officially unveiled earlier yesterday. Its central points:

—Gas pump taxes geared to add five cents to the price of a gallon every year for 10 years, if necessary.

—Hefty taxes on "gas guzzling" cars, starting with the 1978 models due this year, but tempered by rebates for gas efficient cars.

—Taxes on domestic oil designed to drive the prices gradually up to world market levels, and boost consumer prices further.

—Tax credits for insulating homes and businesses. The same for converting to solar heat.

—Standby gasoline rationing authority for emergency use.

The President got standing ovations from his bipartisan audience before and after his address, but members of Congress predicted his program would face a tough battle from many lawmakers, lobbyists and citizens groups. The gas pump tax seemed particularly vulnerable.

Said House Speaker Thomas O'Neill: "The tax bill, the dams, the economic package, they were all skirmishes. This is the battle."

Gov. Michael S. Dukakis applauded the plan, saying it would relieve Americans of wondering of the direction of the nation's energy policies.

Dukakis called Carter's plans "extraordinary," saying they would spur development of solar energy.

Although the proposals got kindly reviews from a number of Carter partisans, industry, labor and consumer groups expressed displeasure with various points.

"Asking America, the richest nation on earth, now to start acting like a poor nation is absolutely contrary to the character of our people," said Rep. Robert Bauman, R-Md.

Framed head and shoulders by a huge American flag in the House of Representatives, Carter told Congress — and millions in his television audience — that he wanted to refund the billions of dollars of revenues collected through the new taxes, primarily through income tax credits.

But the tax credit proposals were vague, in sharp contrast to the specific proposals to collect new levies and make energy consumption more expensive.

Carter made plain at the outset of his speech his proposals would not be politically popular ones, amending his prepared text to ad lib: "I don't expect much applause."

But he was interrupted by applause seven times when he referred to stepping up domestic oil production, preventing windfall profits for oil companies, developing synthetic fuels, shelving the plutonium breeder reactor, speeding up construction of conventional atomic plants, correcting a lack of oil industry competition and preventing oil companies from collecting unearned profits.

He said his goals for 1985 include cutting U.S. energy growth to the point where it will double every 40 years instead of every 18; reducing gasoline consumption 10 per cent below present levels; insulating 90 per cent of America's homes and putting solar energy devices on 2.5 million homes.

300 march on Whitmore

By BERNARD DAVIDOW
Collegian Staff

Three hundred faculty and students marched through the offices of the chancellor and provost yesterday protesting plans to eliminate the Asian Studies and Slavic Languages programs.

Chanting demonstrators carried placards around campus before marching through Whitmore Administration Building. Chancellor Randolph W. Bromery and Paul L. Puryear, vice-chancellor for academic affairs and provost, were not in their offices, but in Boston at a Board of Trustees committee meeting.

The demonstration was without incident, according to campus police.

A noon rally on the steps of the Student Union preceded the march. Faculty and student speakers spoke at one rally in favor of retaining the Asian and Slavic programs.

"How can you ignore half the world?" asked Albert Li, member of the American-Asian Students Association. "To give just the Western view on this campus is just stupid."

The provost's five-year plan would eliminate the Asian and Slavic programs by 1982 and, because of faculty attrition, perhaps as early as the fall of 1978.

Puryear, when contacted at his home last night, said he had only just heard of the demonstration, but that "we are cross-examining all the issues surrounding Asian and Slavic studies."

In addition, he said, "We are carrying on discussion with the other four colleges about continuation of these programs."

The UMass program is the core for a Five-College Asian Studies program, one of the largest in the country, with Smith, Mt. Holyoke, Hampshire and Amherst colleges.

Lucien M. Miller, who teaches in the Asian Studies program, said at the rally, "What is needed is not the elimination of Asian Studies; what we need is the growth of Asian Studies."

He cited an "outward orientation" of the program now and said there should be courses focusing on the Asian-American experience as well, or an "outward orientation" of the program now and said there should be courses focusing on the Asian-American experience as well, or an "inside orientation."

Robert H. Suzuki, another instructor in the program, said the program focused on Asian language and literature because of lack of resources, and many people are "ignorant of Asians in the United States." He urged students to write their legislators and University administrators about the elimination of the program here.

"This is an historic occasion for Asians on this campus," he said about the high Asian turnout. "I think it's high time Asians stand up and be counted on this campus."

Ching-Mao Cheng, chairperson of the Asian Studies program, said afterwards he thought the demonstration went well.

"We hope it will have some effect," he said. All five Asian Studies faculty members, as well as many of the 80 students in the program, attended.

One Slavic Languages student, carrying a sign reading in Russian and English, "Save our Slavic languages dept," estimated there were fewer than 10 students from that program at the march.

Larry S. Roberts, president of the Amherst chapter of the Massachusetts Society of Professors, was met with applause when he and other union members paraded into the rally, already in progress.

He said the union was needed to fight the "arbitrary and unilateral" decisions of the administration.

Puryear's plan has been criticized for sidestepping the recommendations of the faculty Academic Program Review Task Force.

Hite asks senate for new positions

By BRAD GOVERNAN and NIKK ARONSON
Collegian Staff

A proposal by Senator Paul Cronin to allocate $7,500 in salaries for an assistant to the co-presidents Jon Hite and Pinky Batiste agitated a debate erupting in a barrage of verbal character defilements and chastisements of the Senate.

Several senators suggested the position be filled by a work study student rather than by a permanent salaried person.

Under the provisions of the Student Government Association constitution the presidents are allowed three assistants. Co-Presidents Jon Hite and Pinky Batiste ,are requesting only one assistant.

Senator Brian Harvey responded vehemently to the suggestions of these senators and castigated the senate in an imbittered speech which ended with Harvey jumping from the podium and walking out of the senate chambers.

"You forget that these two people were not elected to go off in the ozones... they were elected to do a job," said Harvey. "If you don't give them some help, we're going to be fooling around here forever and if that's what you want then what the fuck are we doing here."

Thunderous applause followed as Harvey walked out of the senate chambers.

Senator David Himmilburger voiced his objections to what he alleged was talk by co-president Hite with another senator that Brian Harvey was the best person for the assistant position.

"I'm taking this opportunity to defile his (Hite) character publicly!" Himmilburger shouted into the microphone.

Speaker of the senate Brian DeLima screamed, "Out of order! Out of order!" Himmilburg shouted, "No Goddammit, it's you Harvey, it's you — (expletives deleted)."

Infuriated by all the chaos and commotions co-president of the Senate Batiste took the podium and chastised the senate for their overzealous actions.

"I'm sick and tired of this goddamn riot!" screamed Batiste. DeLima tried to soothe the aroused crowd by asking senators to pretend they were doing five valium and a couple shots of Chevas Regal.

The senate calmed after the motion was tabled for ten minutes.

Former co-President Paul Cronin took the podium for an emotional speech which also chastised the actions of the senate. Cronin pointed out that similar situations in past senate bodies had resulted in a degeneration of the senate.

"I don't want to see what has been a concerned and dedicated senate transformed into a band of hate," said Cronin.

Socialists' Garza mayor of a union?

By JOE MAGLITTA
Collegian Staff

Catarino Garza wants to be Mayor of New York City.

Garza, a national committee member of the 1700 member Socialist Workers Party, stopped off in Amherst long enough to talk with members of the UMass Young Socialist Alliance last night in the Campus Center.

"Why should I be Mayor of New York City? Mostly to bug the AFL-CIO. Union members everywhere are tired of organizers who don't give a damn about them. Young and old people are tired of being treated rotten. Somebody has to bring a lot of these issues to light. Besides, someone has to run against (Abraham) Beame. Thats why," he said.

Although Garze, 48 is quick to concede he has virtually no chance of becoming mayor. He nonetheless continues to haul his "campaign" and party doctrines from state to state during a five month leave of absence from his teaching job in New York City.

"The prospects for socialism in America will be much better [illegible] get elected mayor though," he told the small [illegible]

Part of [illegible] said Garza, lies in the way he has been [illegible] New York media. "They are not, shall [illegible] sidering us as serious contenders," he [illegible]

Garza is ru[illegible] an all socialist ticket with a woman and a [illegible] man.

"The faces are not likely to change in city governmeant, but the city certainly will. Walk through any number of neighborhoods; Harlem, Stuyvesant, Bronx. The conditions are barbaric and not fit for human life. If there was eight burned out blocks one week, you can count on the fact that there will be twelve the next week and sixteen the next. Have you ever seen an entire burned out city block?"

He blasted New York for being owned by banks, and governed by politicians too timid to stand up to them.

"Mayor Beame is a figurehead. Period," he said.

Garza said Mayor Abraham Beame's pleas to the Carter administration for federal aid have "fallen on deaf ears." Washington will not bail the city out of its financial problems because the situation represents a battle between the ruling interests and working class people, he said.

Garza said rulers have no interest in alleviating the city's problems.

"For democrats and republicans the priorities in city spending are simple: profits first, human needs last," Garza said, "We must organize."

Garza has been active in the National Maritime Union, the United Auto Workers and the United Federation of Teechers, where he has stressed the need for minority support. Garza repeatedly underlined the importance of labor.

"People used to try to avoid unions. They'd say 'Here's my dues, now leave me alone.' This is changing. Up until a few years ago people used to think of the typical American Worker as Archie Bunker. The fact is that workers are no longer mostly white and male. There is an increasing number of women, blacks, chicanos, puerto ricans and other minorities. And they are beginning to organize.

"Labor can be powerful because some of the illusions of the system are changing. Right now you are beginninghto have a generation of people who see that the system is not the cure all. They are starting to demand actions from the unions. They are also looking for other alternativives to the system.

"Labor can exert pressure. The Vietnam war would have been finished a lot sooner if the 15 million AFL-CIO members threatened to stage a one day strike to protest. The fights in the future will be moved out of the ghettos and into the industries. People in labor have the control of the economy. It is an effective power."

Garza said the strong showing for the Socialist candidate in the recent United Steel Workers election was a harbinger of the gradual acceptance of socialist-oriented labor leaders.

"Increasingly, working people are out to elect representatives who will actually represent them. More people are listening," he said.

Garza pointed to the Depression of the 1930's as an example of how socialist and communists worked to establish labor unions receptive to needs of the workers. He said socialists provided ideas to combat the depression, which was "cured" by the advent of WW II.

"People at that time were ready to accept fresh ideas to solve a particular problem. We have the same situation now. There was a time if you tried to distribute our magazine, the Militant, outside a steel plant you would get the cold shoulder, or worse. This is not the case now. People will not embrace you as socialists now, but they will be willing to lend an ear to your ideas. This is what we are trying for," he said.

Dancers to present two spring concerts

By ANN MURPHY
Collegian Staff

The University Dancers and Concert Dance Group will present their annual spring concert tonight at 8 p.m. through Saturday and next Thursday through Saturday nights.

There are two separate programs because of the abundance of choreography.

"There are 21 dances in the upcoming concert. The majority are student works. Almost all seniors have made a contribution. They've worked very hard and are very good dancers," said Marilyn V. Patton, associate professor of dance and director of the dance program.

"Concerts are a chance for our kids to choreograph and get feedback to know what to improve on — this is their growing time," she added.

"We have a lot of very good student work. So much of it that we offer two programs. The choreography is far more sophisticated than five years ago. Because students are so fresh they find a special kind of creativity, a special excitement and energy that is valuable in its own place," said Andrea Watkins, associate professor of dance.

Amherst College senior William Soleau has created "Dialogues of Spring" a sequel to "Dialogues of Autumn" which was presented at the student concert in February. Linda Buckley and Michelle Taylor have composed solo works for their senior projects. Brenda Charron, Daniel Alber, Amy Swanson, Rebecca Renaud and Margaret Chase have also choreographed their last dance to be performed on campus.

Francia McClellan, dance director at Hampshire College, has reconstructed "Shakers," a piece from the late Doris Humphrey originally created in 1931. It will be seen in this weekend's program.

The UMass dance faculty is also contributing choreography. Richard Jones, associate professor of dance, has revised his own "Rodin's Antilier" and will present a new jazz number, "Tears of Joy."

Andrea Watkins has created a piece using voice, music and dance, called "Conversations With Almost Dances." Marilyn Patton has choreographed a duet "Two into One".

Advance tickets are available in the main office of the NOPE and on the C.C. concourse.

Phys Ed's day of play mixes fun with careers

By JUNE CORRIVEAU
Collegian Staff

Career alternatives within the Physical Education department were met at "Any Way To Play Day" held yesterday at the UMass North Physical Education building.

Educational priorities discussed among students, faculty and outside speakers throughout the day long seminars included golfing, hang gliding, avoiding preregistration hassles and noncompetitive games.

"Students don't get enough in their curriculum to put major ideas and thoughts to work," according to coordinator of Play Day and assistant Professor of Physical Education, Polly Ebbs.

"Graduate students within the dept. felt a need of combined ideas, in bringing together an insight into Physical Education," she said.

Robert White, Director of Student Placement said, "Undergraduate students within the Physical Education dept. should strive toward certification, but alternatives to Physical Education can be met, through a broader course curriculum, combining business, and human services incorporated into the Physical Education program.

"We learn from today and Play Day was designed for the kinds of things that don't happen in the classroom, and more of an educational process goes on with the sharing of ideas, in bringing together students, faculty, and outside speakers," Arlen Barber, chairperson of the physical education dept. said.

Dan Tero, a physical education major said, "This would not be possible on another day other than Play Day, it gave me a chance to meet fellow students in my major."

"School systems have grown stagnant in the field of physical education," said student Dan Rosenberg. "I believe in the principle in what we are trying to accomplish."

Combined efforts of faculty, and graduate committee formed the day long and evening events to provide a successful day of "Any Way to Play Day."

Baroque porn flicks may soon be back

Albert Sparks and Baroque Enterprises may soon be showing movies on campus again, as long as the group can present ten members and account for its expenditures for the past year.

Baroque members, Dean of Students William F. Fields, Recognized Student Organization (RSO) program coordinator James Riley, and student government officials met recently to discuss and clarify the past and future status of Baroque as a campus entity.

As an RSO group, Baroque Enterprises is best known for the X rated movies it shows at UMass. During International Women's Week, Field prevented Baroque from showing "Portraits," an X-rated flick, at the Western Massachusetts Public Health building. Since then, Baroque has sponsored no movies.

Sparks has charged the reason Field closed down "Portraits" was because it was a pornographic film. Field denies the allegation, saying he took the action after learning Sparks, the group's president, was not a registered student.

Field assured Sparks Baroque may again function as an RSO group if its records are straight, and if ten UMass undergraduates are listed as members, a requirement of RSO.

Elections

The Southwest Executive Committee elections will be held today in Hampshire Dining Commons from 9 a.m. to 6:30 p.m., and in Berkshire Dining Commons from 10:30 a.m. to 7 p.m.

The candidates for the Executive Committee are: President, Diana Fessenden; Vice-President, Bruce Berkowitz and Donald Bishop; Treasurer(s), Gregory Maynard-Bonnie Ward and Carol Shaw; Communications Coordinator, Joni Mersky and Linda A. Venuti.

GSS elects officers

By JILL CLAY
Collegian Staff

The UMass Graduate Student Senate (GSS) elected Sally Rees as president, Robert Phillips as vice-president, Kenneth Ross as treasurer and David Biggers as secretary last night in a general meeting in Room 904 Campus Center at 7 p.m.

Rees, an animal science student, defeated Biggers, who also ran for president, by a vote of nine to seven, with one abstention.

Rees spoke in favor of the proposed GSS Affirmative Action Policy, which concerns the encouragement of increased hiring of women and minorities.

"We need affirmative action very much," Rees said.

Phillips was elected vice-president by acclamation after Biggers and John Furbish withdrew their nominations. Biggers withdrew "because the other two candidates are more experienced or better qualified."

Ross, running unopposed, was elected treasurer by acclamation.

Biggers defeated present secretary Barbara Stack, by a vote of 12-3, with one abstention. Stack would have resigned in September if reelected.

Stack said she ran partly because "if I'm not elected, we'll have three men and one woman on the executive committee. Being the only woman on the committee makes a difference."

Whites fear genetic death says Welsing

By MARILYN MANKOWSKY
Collegian Staff

"Racism is not what most people think it is. Racism is a global, behavioral system of symbols, logic, thought, speech, actions, emotions, and responses, conscious or unconscious as determined by people who classify themselves as white, for the ultimate goal of white genetic survival," Dr. Frances Cross Welsing said last night to 200 people at the Student Union Ballroom.

Welsing is currently on the staff of the Office of Children and Youth Mental Health Services, Mental Health Administration, Department of Human Resources, District of Columbia Government, Washington, D.C.

Welsing, the author of "The Cress Theory of Color - Confrontation and Racism (White Supremacy)", and the founder of Counter Racist Psychiatry, has attempted to do is to decode the culture, looking at the behavioral phenomenon around us.

In her methods of Counter-Racist Psychiatry she has analyzed black behavior in the context of white supremacy. Her main thesis is that white males fear genetic annihilation; thus they cause the black race to feel and act inferior.

"White supremacy as a system is still intact," says Welsing. She gave several examples from the white everyday culture to back her thesis of the white male's fear of being genetically erased from earth.

When a doctor brings a black baby into the world, the first question the parents ask is, "How light is it, and is it going to have straight hair?" Black people soon learn that the darker you are the uglier you are. Paradoxically, white people learn that the darker the tan is, the more beautiful they appear. While blacks would do anything to lighten their skin, whites risk getting skin cancer for aesthetic reasons.

Welsing related many anecdotal stories on how blacks are born into their racial inferiority complex. "Before blacks learn to read they learn: If you are BLACK, stay back; if you are BROWN, stay around; if you are YELLOW, stay mellow, and if you are WHITE, well then, you are all right."

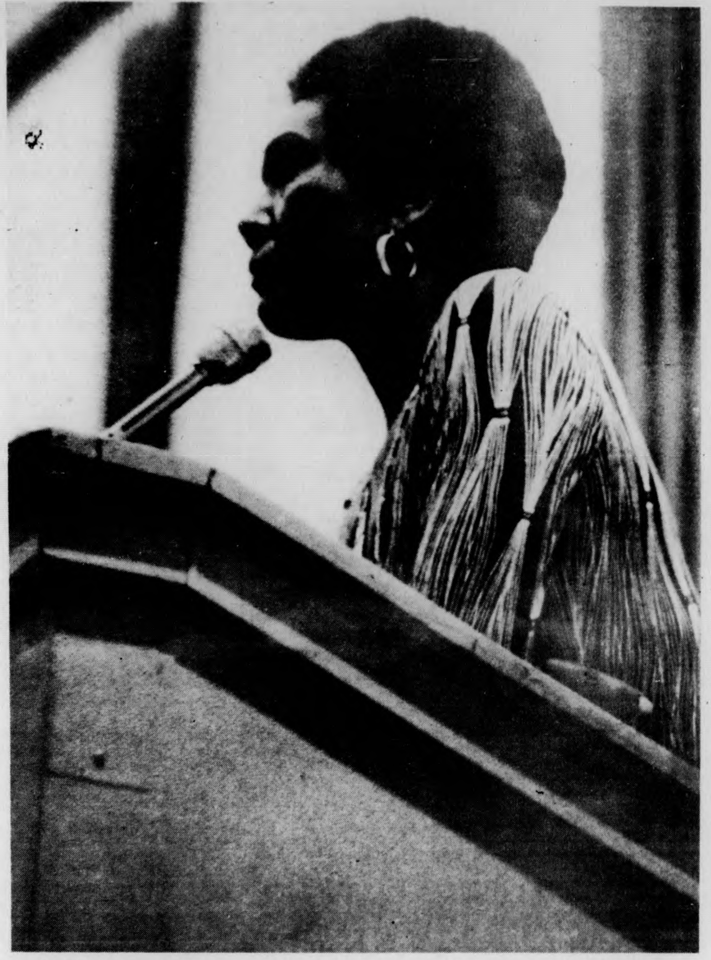
Welsing said, "The critical struggle is between men, because they initiate and carry out the sexual process." She said, "White males will attack black men's testicles whether here or in Vietnam, because that is where the genes are, the vitals of life."

She said the projection has been that sexual aggression emanates from blacks, while it actually has not.

Welsing asked, "If people knew why black people always say 'What's happening?' It's because we have not known what was going on."

She then asked if anyone knew what the black password is. Welsing said the "Black passwood is 'motherfucker.' Motherfucker is a political expression that means powerless. Oppressed people are powerless. Experiencing genetic powerlessnnss, the white man made the black man think of himself as a baby and a motherfucker," she added.

Welsing defined sexism as the white males telling the females that they are superior to them, coming about because white males feel genetically inferior. If a white male cannot be superior to blacks then he is going to exert his dominance and superiority over woman.



"Racism is not what most people think," Dr. Francis Cress Welsing said yesterday. (Staff photo by Marilyn Mankowsky)

Dukakis testifies for ed shake-up

By JOE QUINLAN
Collegian Staff

Gov. Michael S. Dukakis yesterday testified before Massachusetts legislature's Education Committee in favor of his proposal to replace the state's Board of Higher Education with a gubernatorial-appointed 15 member Board of Overseers.

Others appearing at the hearing to support house bill 5756 included UMass faculty senate Secretary Terence Burke and Jeffrey B. Ludtke of the Amherst chapter of the American Association of University Professors (AAUP).

Former UMass student trustee Paul M. Cronin, presented opposition to the bill for Student Government Association (SGA) co-Presidents Pinky Batiste and Jon Hite, who were not present.

During his testimony, Dukakis said that unless some board with more planning power is created, the administration may have to look for other methods of financing higher education other than the present fiscal autonomy, which allows a campus to spend its allocated money as it sees fit.

Secretary of Educational Affairs Paul Parks last night defended Dukakis, saying expensive program duplication, such as engineering, could prevent Massachusetts from "producing an exceptional school" because funds must be divided among different campuses with the same program.

Senate President Kevin B. Harrington (D-Salem) said last night he supports fiscal autonomy as he did 15 years ago, when he was one of its initial proponents.

"Without fiscal autonomy, bureaucracy would cripple higher education," he said. Under direct financial control of the state, Harrington said, a campus would not be able to "change a light bulb, or promote a teacher" without using triplicate forms in Boston.

He added he did agree with Dukakis' intentions to eliminate campus segmentation on the proposed Board of Overseers. There should be one board, said Harrington, to decide "what is best for all higher education."

Ludtke said AAUP supports the reorganizaton bill this year because it is acceptable to its standards.

On the other hand, he said AAUP opposed last year's proposal because it was "contrary to the principles of AAUP."

Ludtke said the lay governing board planned by Dukakis is one feature which meets AAUP's approval.

He said he did not think Dukakis' advice to eliminate duplicate programs in the state system would deprive a region of a school, just because it existed elsewhere in the state. "Unnecessary duplication," Ludtke said, would be cutback.

TV agreement inked, ready for FCC o.k.

By JOHN MORAN
Collegian Staff

The final ten-year agreement between Pioneer Valley Cablevision and the Center for Community Access Television (CCATV) to provide public access television for Amherst was signed by representatives of both groups yesterday.

The contract will be forwarded to the Federal Communications Commission (FCC) for its approval. The FCC is expected to rule favorably on the agreement within the next two months.

Terms of the agreement have Pioneer providing CCATV with video equipment and $3000 operating expenses for each of the first four years. Money for operating expenses will increase to $4000 for each remaining year of the franchise after the initial three year period.

With only a portion of that money available for rent, CCATV is currently conducting an intensive search for studio space from which to conduct their operations.

"Under its license Pioneer Valley Cablevision is required to furnish community access. We (CCATV) took that responsibility off their hands. They provide us with equipment and some funds and we administer the community access to the station," said David Skillikorn, a signer of the community access contract and a member of the Student Video Project (SVP).

The SVP hopes to hold a prominent position in the new plans for public access, especially in relation to student participation.

"We want to encourage people to come to us with their ideas for a program," said Skillikorn. "This is not only for a group, but for individuals to get support in the planning and technical aspects of a production.

"The biggest problem we have right now is our equipment, which is bad. With the equipment from Pioneer, things will improve greatly," he said. "The work we're doing now will become especially important next year. When the capability comes, we want to be able to use it."

'New Games' lotsa laps

By LARRY COHEN
Collegian Staff

A world's record may be broken at UMass next week when 3,000 people will attempt to form a circle around the campus pond and sit in each others' laps.

It's part of the New Games Tournament, an outdoor event stressing cooperation and enjoyment rather than winning, being held April 29 from noon to 3 p.m. around the campus pond.

A referee training session will be held on April 28 during one day. The actual tournament is designed to "turn people on to the spirit of play, in a cooperative sense," according to the tournament's organizer, Norm Burger.

"The tournament will generate good feeling throughout the community, and facilitate interaction among all the participants," said Burger, a UMass leisure studies student.

Burger said he became interested in New Games after viewing a presentation by the New Games Foundation while attending a National Recreation Parks Association Conference in Boston last October. The Foundation is a non-profit recreational program which began in 1972 as "an alternative to the highly competitive type games most of us have gotten used to," said Burger.

"The tournament is not anti-competition," said Burger. "There is competition involved, but it doesn't get to the point where you forget you have to cooperate too to enjoy yourself."

Burger explained that Earthball, one of the tournament's most popular games, involves a six-foot, canvas covered ball and two teams of 300 or more persons who try to hit it into a goal.

"Everyone usually keeps on switching sides so that the teams stay even," said Burger. "But if a goal is accidentally scored, that's okay too!"

The tournament is free and open to the public. The UMass Program Council, Southwest Assembly, Central Area Council, Orchard Hill, Sylvan dorms, and the Student Senate all support the New Games Tournament.

The tournament needs approximately 100 volunteers to attend the referee training session on the 28, and to serve as referees for the tournament games on the 29th. If interested, call 545-3600.

In case of rain, the tournament will be held in the Student Union Ballroom.

★ SGA budget proposed

"We deplore the kinds of methods being used to cut programs without any faculty involvement," Roberts said.

Demonstrators left the rally and marched through the Campus Center and around the back of the campus pond before circling Whitmore.

There were shouts of "Dare to struggle; dare to win," and "They say cutback; we say fightback," as 170 demonstrators left the Student Union, picked up passers-by, and grew to 300 while approaching Whitmore.

After marching around the first and second floors of Whitmore, the group gathered at the bottom of the ramp leading to the building. Jon A. Hite, Student Government Association co-president, said the University needs a larger budget from the state to fund all University programs. He said students must contact their state legislators because "they're the ones who will vote on the budget."

Sen. D. McEnroe, a student in the Asian Studies program and one of the organizers of the demonstration, agreed and suggested there be cuts elsewhere in the state instead of the University.

"I think it (the demonstration) went pretty well," he said. "We got more students than we expected."

"The cuts affect everyone," he said, and with them "the University would become very ethnocentric."

The proposal to make the president assistant a permanent salaried position finally passed with the stipulation that the coordinating committee have the responsibility of making the hiring selection.

According to Senator Susan Berminham this procedure will ease the problem of patronage of which many senators were concerned.

Harvey included that he was not taking his name out of consideration for the job. "Do anything you think is necessary to stop this from turning into a quicky patronage job. But don't let patronage get in the way of considering this job," said Harvey.

The motion also included that the person hired to the position be responsible to report to the presidents in all but one area.

In the area of legislative liason the assistant will be responsible to the advocacy services committee, coordinating committee and the senate.

The meeting was adjourned by order of DeLima at 2:00 p.m. after uncontrollable chaos erupted. To anyones recollection it was the first time a senate meeting had to be adjourned by the speaker because things were out of control.

Carter's plan hailed, blasted

WASHINGTON [UPI] — Environmental groups said yesterday President Carter's energy plan means the survival of future generations. But industry, labor and consumer interests didn't know if their generation could live with the details.

Several major environmental organizations, including the Sierra Club, the National Resources Defense Council and Friends of the Earth, said the energy plan is "fair and farsighted" because it relies on conservation and use of renewable resources.

Common-Cause chairman John Gardner said if special interest groups succeed in clawing away at Carter's program, "the nation will suffer and we'll be left wondering whether a free society has the guts to do any uncomfortable thing."

Plot on Marx' life seen

SANTA MONICA, Calif. [UPI] — A private detective testifying at a guardianship hearing for Groucho Marx said Wednesday that Marx' female companion, Erih Fleming, had threatened Tuesday night to kill him because of findings he had made in the case.

Norman Perle, the private investigator, had testified earlier that Miss Fleming wanted to hide syringes Perle found in a storm drain at Marx' home.

Miss Fleming and Marx' son, Arthur, are battling to be named conservators and guardians for the 86-year-old comedian. Perle originally had been hired by Miss Fleming.

News in Brief

Reputed dope kingpins busted

RIO GRANDE CITY, Tex. [UPI] — More than 50 reputed leaders of an international smuggling ring were arrested Wednesday in "Operation Wishbone", the latest drive to halt the flow of drugs from Mexico to the United States.

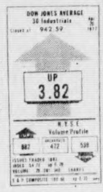
Authorities said the smuggling operation supplied the American market with 40 tons of Mexican marijuana and 44 pounds of heroin every month.

Committee gets $2.5 M

WASHINGTON [UPI] — A House Administration subcommittee yesterday approved a $2.5 million budget for the Assassinations Committee.

Among the items cut from the budget request was $124,800 to repay staff members who took voluntary pay cuts when the panel's status was in jeopardy earlier in the year.

Stocks make advances



NEW YORK [AP] — Word of a healthy first-quarter increase in the growth rate of the economy prompted a moderate advance in the stock market Wednesday.

Some of the gains were eroded by late selling as traders awaited President Carter's energy message to Congress Wednesday night.

Security wiretaps disputed

WASHINGTON [UPI] — The Carter administration and a House subcommittee chairman told a federal judge Wednesday they are deadlocked in their bitter dispute over congressional access to records of national security wiretaps.

U.S. District Judge Oliver Casch now must decide whether to insist on further negotiations or advise the Circuit Court of Appeals there is no way to avoid a major court clash between the executive and legislative branches.

Bill bans boycott

WASHINGTON [UPI] — The House passed a bill Wednesday making it illegal for American citizens to comply with the Arab boycott against Israel.

The vote was 364 to 43.

Bottle bill becomes slowed in Senate

BOSTON [UPI] — Attempts by its backers to recycle the bill banning nonreturnable bottles and cans yesterday bogged down again in the Massachusetts Senate.

Two compromise amendments offered by Senate Ways and Means Committee Chairman James A. Kelly Jr., D-Oxford, were killed — one on a 17-19 roll call, the other on a voice vote without debate — and the Senate adjourned without acting on a proposal to outlaw cans with throwaway flip-top openers.

Action on that proposal could come Thursday but is not expected before Monday when the Senate next meets in full formal session.

Kelly has been trying for more than two weeks to save legislation which would prohibit nonreturnable bottles and cans in Massachusetts and impose 5-cent and 10-cent deposits on beer and soft drink containers.

The two amendments defeated Wednesday provided a tax incentive to bottlers, retraining of bottle and can workers, called for a nonbinding referendum in the 1978 ballot and a delay in implementation until 1980.

Local towns get sewage money

BOSTON [AP] — More than $7 million has been awarded to the towns of Northampton and South Hadley to help eliminate discharges of raw sewage into the Connecticut River, the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency announced.

The EPA regional office said Tuesday $91,000 also has been granted to Chicopee to finish designing new sewers.

Court rules motto may be covered

WASHINGTON [AP] — The Supreme Court ruled Wednesday that you are not required to display ideological messages such as "Live Free or Die" that states put on auto license plates.

Using one family's objection to that motto on New Hampshire license plates, the Supreme Court said an individual can refuse to display the messages on auto plates or other personal property.

Prison protest dropped

BOSTON [AP] — Gardner officials withdrew their opposition to a new prison facility at the closed Gardner State Hospital Wednesday, a major breakthrough for the state Correction Department.

The reversal paved the way for approval by the House Ways and Means Committee of an approximately 150-inmate facility. A decision on new facilities will be made within 10 days, Rep. John J. Finnegan, D-Boston, chairman, said.

At the latest hearing, there was strong opposition to three other possible prison sites: Otis Air Base on Cape Cod, the former Westover Air Force Base in Chicopee, and Westboro State Hospital.

Krishnas claim persecution

BOSTON [AP] — Hare Krishna devotees trying to head off a legislative investigation of their fund-raising practices say they are "sick and tired" of being persecuted for their beliefs.

And the group brought in Harvard theologian Harvey Cox to testify on their behalf yesterday before a legislative committee considering a bill calling for an investigation of fund raising by religious cults.

Reps up pay

BOSTON [UPI] — Without a roll call, the Massachusetts house Wednesday voted to give the state's 280 legislators an $850-a-year pay raise. Opponents of the measure termed the action "a daylight raid on the state treasury."

The pay bill was passed on a voice vote. A motion to reconsider the action is scheduled for debate Thursday or Monday.

If the measure is passed by the Senate and signed by Gov. Michael S. Dukakis it will boost the pay for House and Senate members from $13.800 to $14,650.

Efforts by Republicans to force a roll call on the bill failed on several occasions.

Super words

"When I use a word," Humpty Dumpty said, in rather a scornful tone, "it means just what I choose it to mean — neither more nor less."

Lewis Carroll

Frequently things appear in the Collegian which many readers do not understand. Sometimes this is because the writer is in fact not saying anything. But other times it is because the writer may be having trouble with the English language.

Mostly the problem seems to lie with words. Words are tricky things. It used to be that words were part of complete thought which would then be judged on its merits. But this is no longer so. For it seems that certain words have become Superwords, and by themselves decide the merits of the things they have become associated with. Examples:

"Progressive". This is an archtypal talismanic word. It carries with it connotations of "enlightened" and "good". The magic thing about this word is that when you call something "progressive", it really becomes that way! The good thing about it is that if you know something is in fact progressive, you no longer even have to think about its merits. For how could anything labelled progressive be anything but good?

"Oppression". Back in the old foolish times, oppression meant "to subjugate or persecute by unjust or tyrannical use of force or authority". E.g., "the peasants were oppressed by the feudal lords". But now it even applies in contexts like these:

—Oppression is having to live in dorms.

—Oppression is paying $500 in tuition.

—Oppression is not having "Control over our Lives". The wonderful thing here is that students can now self-pityingly put these things in the same category as murder or slavery.

Superwords can also be used to throw the other side off balance when your own side doesn't quite know who to blame for its own incompetence. Consider "Whitmore" or alternatively "the Administration". Whenever anything happens around here that doesn't quite satisfy students, who gets the blame? Or how about "OSCAR" the computer? Obviously it's much more comfortable to blame the silly machine for mistakes you really made.

Some Superwords confer authority and wisdom upon their users. Consider the verb "to educate". Whenever some group makes a demand, and the other side just doesn't seem to understand, the standard line is "well, we'll just have to educate them". Not only does this lend an aura of dignity to the erst-while teachers, but the imputation of ignorance on the part of the other side is singularly ego-satisfying.

Finally, some words are Superwords simply because of the awe they inspire when they are thrown around. The heaviest of these is without doubt "racist". If something or some action is condemned as "racist", that's it, it's finished. This word is so powerful that you don't even have to be accurate when you throw it.

For example consider the Bracey-Davis letter concerning the Puryear-Faculty Senate flap. Certainly some actions at that Faculty Senate meeting were inexcusable, but the charge of racism effectively diverted attention from the main issue, namely the ramifications of the Puryear plan.

"Racist" is also such a good word because of the various meanings it takes on depending on who is hurling it. Here are just a few of the various assigned meanings that have appeared in dictionaries or the Collegian:

—Racism is the notion that one's own ethnic stock is superior;

—Racism is not an attitude toward blacks, but an attitude whites have toward themselves (Julius Lester);

—Racism is white supremacy (Black Affairs, 20 Apr.).

And there are many more. Somehow it doesn't seem fair; "When I make a word do a lot of work like that" said Humpty Dumpty, "I always pay it extra."

Consider qualifications

To the Editor:

After reading Jay Martus' commentary "Ponderings on the Provost's plan," I found among the many pompous phrases one statement that was totally inaccurate and misleading. Martus asserts that "[Puryear's] decision to look not only at the qualifications of the individual faculty member, but the demand for positions elsewhere within the university, should be applauded."

If Mr. Martus had been listening to why the faculty on this campus are so enraged, and what has caused a "flurry of flaming rhetoric," he might have discovered that the Provost is not considering a faculty member's qualifications. Six years of diligent academic work by a professor on this campus appears to have no importance to the Provost. Professors who care about their students, who have published, who are flexible, and who are able to teach [a trait lacking in many academic scholars] will be denied tenure if the Provost's plan is enacted. Puryear is making his recommendations for tenure solely on where his five-year plan shows a greater need for teaching positions [a plan that was produced by dubious methods and is being applied by those same dubious methods].

How any student at this University, especially a former co-President of SGA, could "applaud" our illustrious Provost's attempt to eliminate the Slavic and Asian language departments; which include two of the languages spoken by the other "superpowers" of the world, is totally beyond me.

Mr. Martus should first get his facts straight and also understand the ramifications of his statements before "guessing" as a Collegian commentator.

False insecurity

To the Editor:

Though our protest is probably of negligible value, we would like it known that we strongly oppose the locks put on all doors of the Southwest community. The rationale for this is "security". We argue that it violates the spirit of camaraderie that a college community is supposed to foster. No longer can you stop by to see a friend in another dorm on a whim. Instead you will have to call beforehand and have him or her allow you in. If s-he is not there, you won't be able to leave a note on his or her door or a message with the person next door. Security! If one locks his or her door, shouldn't that suffice? We weren't consulted — or even notified. The first hint came when the workmen began drilling. It seems quite unfair and absurd.

Puryear's report: Serious questions

Provost Paul L. Puryear's proposed long-term plan for departmental faculty allocations has become the source of the most heated controversy on this campus in some time. Puryear's memo raises philosophical questions that extend far beyond the scope of the plan itself, and disagreements over how the plan was arrived at and how it was responded to have made the issue a terribly complex one.

The report, supposedly based on projected student to faculty ratios, recommends faculty cutbacks in a number of departments, particularly in the College of Arts and Sciences. Two questions must be considered in judging the provost's plan. Are its projections of student demand for programs accurate, and if so, should faculty allocations be rearranged accordingly?

The report is derived from statistics on departmental enrollment for the past two years. By Puryear's own admittance, his plan virtually ignores the suggestions made in a November, 1976 report by the Academic Program Review Task Force, a group chaired by Associate Provost David C. Bischoff. Significant discrepancies that exist between the two plans strongly suggest that both should be examined more closely before either is adopted.

No matter who is doing the projecting, however, it seems that the economic atmosphere of the 1970's has created an increased emphasis by students on career training that promises some sense of financial security upon leaving school. The crux of the matter is that public institutions, faced with severe funding crunches (e.g. level funding), must make difficult decisions about their academic priorities. Governor Dukakis made this point perfectly clear in his visit to campus.

It is a common and effective ploy to play various groups off against each other when seeking to act to the detriment of each. This is the divide-and-conquer plan at which Dukakis appears to be doing so well. We are so busy making the choice between liberal and career educations that we seldom stop and wonder why the choice must be made at all.

And once again, racial tensions have been aggravated unnecessarily. The hostility of the faculty's attack on Puryear (who is black) prompted accusations from black faculty that the attack was at least partially racial in nature. One can hardly deny that many of the criticisms were less than civil.

We oppose the provost's plan on three grounds. Firstly, it assumes that we will be forced to deal with level funding — an assumption we aren't ready to accept right now. Second, it by-passes a rather extensive study of the same issue completed just last November. And last, its call for drastic reductions of liberal arts programs already strained by budgeting problems is not a viable solution to whatever constraints we may ultimately be faced with.

Nonetheless, reality dictates that we start thinking about some of these difficult questions. Can the university afford to ignore trends in student demand? How can the value of a liberal education be measured and compared with that of a professional education? What do the students want? What do the citizens of Massachusetts want? What do you want? Before jumping to conclusions, let's give these issues some serious thought.

A sack of potatoes?

By BOB MELIA
Collegian Staff

A fascinating event occurred Tuesday, April 12 at the Amherst Regional Junior High School. Twenty-three newly-elected Town Meeting Members (TMM) were assembled to vote to break a tie between two fellow TMM. The winner would get a three year seat and the loser would get a two year term. Of the two people involved in the tie, one was a student (Bob Melia) and one a townsperson (Mr. Rice).

Melia, being a junior and thus having only two years left in Amherst anyway, was personally indifferent about the vote and originally wanted to withdraw from the race and let Mr. Rice have the three-year seat uncontested.

However several other students insisted that Melia run. They argued that he should take the three-year seat and resign it two years later when he graduated because a special election would then be held, giving students a chance at the seat for the extra year. As the whole purpose of running for election was to maximize student representation in town government, Melia conceded to the logic of his fellow students' argument and agreed to run for the three-year term.

As students had banded together on a slate to win the election, it appeared certain that Melia would win the tie-breaker because students controlled 13 of the 21 votes to be cast. Thinking the vote a mere formality, Melia was shocked when he lost, 12-8. Apparently one student abstained and four voted for Mr. Rice.

The fact that Melia suffered a personal defeat is unimportant because he still has a seat for the duration of his stay in Amherst. What is important, and very disturbing, is that 13 students, faced with a clear-cut test of student interest vs. town interest, failed the test.

Even more disturbing is the fact that these were students who were active and concerned enough to get themselves elected in the first place and who thus should be especially aware that the student interest would be best served by voting for Melia. Worse still, eight students, including some of those who most strenuously urged Melia not to give the seat to Mr. Rice without a fight, did not even bother to come!

As these 13 students who either failed to come or came and failed to vote for Melia are (one hopes) of at least average intelligence and are at least moderately politically conscious, one cannot argue that their failure to vote for the student interest is indicative of some mental or social deficiency peculiar to them.

This leaves only two reasons for their failure to vote for the student interest. Either there is no student interest or else that interest exists but few people realize it exists because it has not yet been adequately clarified and publicized.

We should all hope the latter is correct because if no student interest exists, we will be doomed to remain an amorphous powerless mass and we will continue to be exploited by state pols, the administration and whatever other groups decide to join the fun.

But if a student interest does exist, there is hope that it can be discovered, defined and disseminated. This interest will then provide us with a set of issues to organize around and hopefully give us the power to assert our rights not only as students, but as responsible human beings capable of making the decisions which are central to our lives.

Karl Marx once contemptuously referred to 19th century French peasants as nothing but a "sackful of potatoes" because they weren't conscious of their own class interest and consequently were easy prey for the French upper-classes to exploit. If we are to be more than a sackful of potatoes, more than easy prey, we must define our interest, organize around it and finally start to assert our right to control our own lives.

Spring concert loose ends

To the Editor:

This year's Spring Concert, on Saturday, May 7, promises to be a fine day of music for all those who attend. At this time I would like to clear up much of the controversy that has plagued the show.

A lot of untied ends have come together and I would sincerely like to thank everyone who remained with the show during difficult times.

Much has been said about the difficulty of acquiring talent. Having worked on this show from the beginning I have seen both the low points and the high points of the search. However, acquiring talent is not the only factor that is involved in the concert, though this aspect tends to dominate.

The reality of this show started back in December, while most of us were leaving for intersession. At this time, it was necessary for someone to work on the structural organization of the show. David Kantor was appointed executive co-ordinator of the concert and remained in Amherst through January. The payment he received for the work done that month was very justified in my opinion. During that time David put in 40 hour weeks, paid rent in an apartment, and had to buy food.

During his intersession job, Dave was responsible, researching the feasibility and setting up the direction of the first paying stadium concert. He released newsletters keeping all involved up to date on the show as well as developing a time table to work by. At the conclusion of his appointment, a detailed report, including budget, physical details, security etc. was released to the concert committee as well as to the Senate. This work proved to be very professional and well worth the small sum of money he was paid.

Although others feel they could have done a better job in the structure, I find this hard to agree or disagree. It is now best to look forward the future and not dwell on the past. Let's be happy that we have a concert. The credit of this concert should be justly distributed to everyone who put their time into its reality. I feel that Dave's efforts were not entirely in vain and he should be thanked for his achievements rather than be condemned for his work.

Spring Concert Coordinator

Double threat

By BRADLEY S. KLEIN

Graduate education at UMass Amherst is under attack from a number of administrative quarters. If graduate students don't quickly organize a collective response to the forthcoming reductions in teaching assistantship monies and general advanced degree programs, we will soon find ourselves in, at best, a profoundly second rate graduate school. The Provost's Five Year Plan, like the long-range plan of State Commissioner of Education Paul Parks, portends disaster for many current graduate programs. And the cuts are by no means limited to the humanities and social sciences; through either plan the natural sciences are going to suffer too.

Any notion that these plans are merely "proposals" sent out to the university-community for general feedback and commentary is quickly disproved by a look at the budget lines for the coming academic year. Under Governor Dukakis' very limited $68.1 million budget, the administration is due a budget increase, under the rubric of "fiscal autonomy", while the TA funds are slated for no growth whatsoever. Even under a more likely level-funding university budget for 1977-78, "0-3" funds (from which TA's are paid) are not going to be increased over this year's levels.

Individual department budgets for next year already reflect the pinch on graduate student funding. No departments in any of the colleges expect increases in TA monies over this year's levels, and many departments are going to lose graduate student funding. Slavic and Asian Studies are to be cut completely, Philosophy and Comparative Literature by more than two thirds, and ten per cent cuts are coming down on Political Science, Physics, Astronomy, and Chemistry.

For graduate students this means increased workloads, no possibility of wage increases (except at the expense of other graduate students), no recourse through any grievance procedures, increased competition among students for a shrinking number of appointments, and the very real threat to graduate programs as enrollments drop and programs (like Slavic and Asian Studies) are gutted completely.

Even students whose programs are not immediately threatened are going to suffer from these recently announced budget priorities. The growth of the administration's budget gives rise to discretionary funding outside traditional graduate departments. Thus students will be forced to seek funding in programs outside their academic field, and on one year contracts that provide no assurances of rehiring or funding to degree completion. Remaining TA positions will be more difficult to obtain, and competition among graduate students will pit us against ourselves.

Under such conditions there will be no job security for graduate students; and having obtained an assistantship there would be no protection against increased workloads beyond the 20 hours per week now set as the upper limit by the university.

Inseparable with this problem is the issue of declining educational quality. As TA's become harder to get and graduate students are forced to leave the school, programs in both the graduate school and on the undergraduate level are going to be affected severely. Already the push is on for higher student to faculty ratios; with graduate students forced outside their degree programs for employment, the university will find itself increasingly dependent upon students teaching in fields outside their specialty.

Only a collective response to these graduate programs cuts can be effective. Job security and the quality of our education will be seriously, perhaps irreversably undermined, unless action is taken by graduate students in coordination with the entire university community. The coming crisis in graduate education, indeed in public education across-the-board, is too imminent a threat for us to deflect our resources and energy in in-fighting. Given the extraordinary conditions we now face this would constitute an acquiescence in the administration's long-term plans.

For graduate students especially, the double threat to job security and our education affords us little time to respond. But respond we must and show the administration that we will not be deprived of our right to higher education.

An emergency meeting for all graduate students will be held on Thursday, April 21, at 4 p.m. in room 101 of the Campus Center. Sponsored by the Graduate Student Employees Union, that meeting will afford all graduate students the opportunity to stand united against the university in defense of our graduate careers, in advocay of job security for graduate students, and in the name of quality higher education for graduate and undergraduate students alike.

Job time

Chapter No. 33 in the misadventures of Martha Newcomb, or, How to write a resumé.

Since I haven't won the Lottery yet, or become independently wealthy through any other means, and I'm not coming back to school in the fall, it naturally follows that I have to come up with a job but soon. "Supporting yourself can be fun," the part that stinks is finding the job.

I'm moving to a place that I don't have any connections for a job, so I thought the best plan of action lay in conjuring up one hellava resumé. First I thought of sending letters to various places that I wanted to work at saying, "IF YOU DON'T GIVE ME A JOB, I'LL BLOW UP YOUR BUILDING," but they either wouldn't believe me or arrest me, so I decided to take the normal route first.

Part 1 of a resumé is easy: personal data. I didn't put down whether I was male or female because if they couldn't tell what I am from my name then I wouldn't want to work for them anyways.

Part 2 gets a little trickier: education. A friend of mine went to night school at Harvard and I had gone to a class or two with him. I probably would have put on my resumé that I went to Harvard except I couldn't remember the two dates that I went there. Besides, who'd want to be handed a job just because they went to Harvard. Ha.

One quality of a resume is that it gets harder, section by section. Part 3 is for work experience. The lousy part about this section is that you have to put down the dates when you started and when you stopped (were fired, quit, etc.) I've done plenty of jobs that sound impressive just for a day or two.

I'm still wondering whether or not I should have down that summer that I hired the kids in the neighborhood to wax cars for me. The kids got candy and firecrackers, the people got their cars back shiney, and I got money. Everyone was happy.

The last part of the resumé is where you go wild: qualifications. I'm still not clear if that means, what you think you're qualified for, or what you're qualified for by your past work experience. It's probably the latter, but I figure there's no harm in using a little bit of both. Just because I swept the floor in a hairdressers when I was 15, it doesn't mean that I want it in my qualifications.

If you haven't already, you'll probably have to write up a resumé sooner or later. I'd suggest volunteering or getting involved in as many things as you can before that "sooner or later" comes up. It could never hurt and it's great for trumping up your resumé as well as for the experience.

I've left some space though, at the end of my resumé, so I can always pencil in " ... BLOW UP YOUR BUILDING" How do you think I got my job with the Collegian?

Women's intramural frisbee team formed

The UMass Frissee Club has formed an ultimate frisbee intramural program which is open to the community to join. All women who are interested in learning and sharing the skills and fun of ultimate frisbee on an all-women team are urged to come to NOPE this afternoon at 3:45. No experience is necessary, just a desire to have a good time while you learn. Our games are every Thursday at 4 p.m. Call Charlotte Allen for more information and to sign up at 549-6702 or 545-0341.

Heronemus to speak on alternative energy

An outspoken advocate of solar and wind power, professor William E. Heronemus, will present his views concerning a national solar energy policy tonight at 8 in the UMass Campus Center Auditorium (CCA).

His lecture comes just after President Carter has announced the plan for a national energy policy on nationwide television.

Heronemus has impressive credentials for speaking on energy including a background as a Navy captain building nuclear submarines and as project officer at UMass for a unique solar and wind powered furnace experiment.

The talk will be the third of the UMass Chancellor's Lecture Series for 1977 honoring distinguished faculty members. The public is invited to the address.

Fashion Show at Skinner Aud. tonight

The Fashion Council and Sales Promotion Class of the School of Home Economics at UMass presents: "Oscars of Fashion," a show of spring and summer fashions, in Skinner Auditorium tonight at 7:30. There is no admission charge and door prizes will be awarded.

The fashions will be modeled by students and fashion council members. For info call Debbie Wolfson, 665-2367.

Dr. Jagan: Economic struggle in 3rd world

Dr. Cheddi Jagan, former prime minister of British Guiana, will speak tonight at 7:30 in Shattuck auditorium in the Public Health Center, (adjacent to the Morrill Science Center).

The topic is "The Struggle for Economic Independence in Asia, Africa, Latin America, and the Carribean."

Fall 77 course lists distributed in CC

Schedule pamphlets for undergraduates, graduate and Stockbridge courses for fall semester will be distributed today on the Campus Center Concourse.

They may also be picked up at the Calendar and Schedule Office in Whitmore after 2 Friday afternoon, as long as the supply lasts.

Schedule pamphlets for faculty will be distributed in the same office by departments today and tomorrow.

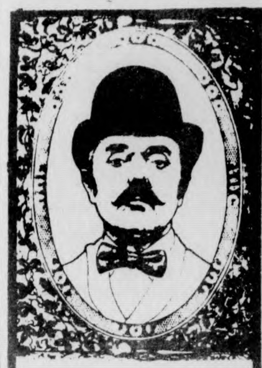
DINNER — Baked Ham with Raisin Sauce, Rotini with Meatballs, Fruit Salad Plate; Basics; Rotini with Tomato Sauce, Baked Fish.



So I say to you my friends that even though we must face the difficulties of today and tomorrow, I still have a dream. It is a dream deeply rooted in the American dream that one night, Monday night, a beer will cost thirty-five cents that one night, Tuesday night, a glass of fine wine will cost fifty cents. That one night, Wednesday night, hot dogs for all will be free (as long as they last). This is our hope. This is our faith.

Your Birthday

by Stella Wilder

Thursday, April 21 — Born today, you possess a genuine concern for other people. Even more important, you possess a knack for expressing that concern in ways that console the spirit at the same time that they materially aid in the solution of difficulties. You live in -- and tremendously enjoy --a highly competitive commercial world. Nevertheless, you are neither blase nor jaded when it comes to your response to a call for help of any kind. You are assured of lasting friendships by virtue of your willingness to give greatly of yourself and your tangible and intangible possessions. Your warmth is reflected in the interest you take and in the comfort you hold out to those in need. Your reward you consider satisfactory if it involves relief to the oppressed, suffering and troubled.

Neither hasty nor impatient, you are quite willing to put in a great deal of time getting a single aspect of a given job absolutely right. A classicly slow mover, you are accurate, exact and extremely cautious. Your caution, however, never stands in the way of your progress, for although you may reach your goal somewhat later than another person might, you reach it in better spirits and with fewer setbacks -- and, thus, upsets -- along the way. Your projects advance at times at a snail's pace -- but somewhere along the line, you always manage to overtake and pass the proverbial hare.

You are not one to leave anything to chance. You take great pains and preparation to see that your endeavors are well suited to your talents and to your capacity for work.

Friday, April 22

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) — Take care that the side you show to another today is not entirely foreign to both your natures. Begrudge no one an explanation.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) — You can enhance your position considerably if you will be diplomatic when asked for your opinion. Be honest without being brutal.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) — Temper the reasonable approach with just enough emotion to allow affection to be displayed discretely. Children prove surprising.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) — Bitterness over a recent disappointment may be spoiling your chances for future gain. Make an effort to forget and forgive.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) — Work and the exploitation of your talents in the pursuit of creative goals: these are the answers to boredom. Seek them out.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) — If you can match your intelligence to that of a companion, you are off to a good start. An interesting day is your reward for effort.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) — You would do well not to voice an opinion of another's talent until you have considered well the totality of his assignment.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) — Unless you can act in such a way that personal pleasure is part of the day's yield, you cannot consider yourself successful at this point.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) — Work toward the fulfillment of your ambition. If you wait for another to take action on your behalf, you may wait a long time.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) — Reconsider your personal appearance. You may have been trying in the wrong way to create or re-create an image of calm.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) — The loss of material possessions is the least of it today. Personal disappointment causes considerable grief. Ultimately, it passes.

ARIES (March 21-April 19) — You can change another's life for the better -- and at the same time advance your own chances for success considerably. Mark out a course of action.

Olympic construction starts

LAKE PLACID, N.Y. [UPI] — President Carter's son, Chip, Olympic officials and an array of local politicans were to highlight official groundbreaking ceremonies today as construction begins for the 1980 Winter Olympics.

The ground-breaking symbolically marks the return to the international limelight of this small Adirondack mountain village — host of the 1932 winter olympics.

It also will provide a badly needed economic boost to an area which suffers from chronic unemployment. Olympic officials expect the construction to provide 450 jobs at its peak.

Gov. Hugh Carey's son, Donald, 21, and daughter, Helen, 17, were to stand in for their father, who had a speaking engagement in Ireland.

After lengthy environmental hearings and lobbying for government aid to prepare for the games, all that remains before construction can start is the letting of bids, according to local officials.

The construction will include a new field house, speed skating oval, 90-meter ski jump and athletes' housing, among other projects.

The state will use about $12 million to build a new Luge run, refrigerate the current bobsled run and improve ski trails on state-owned mountains near the village.

The field house is expected to be completed by April 1979, the skating oval by next January and the ski jump by October 1978, he said.

Notices

Eliot Asinof will speak on the Black Sox scandal of 1919 at Herter Hall 231, 12:20 p.m. on Monday, April 25.

Asinof, who played minor league baseball himself for three years in the Philadelphia Phillies farm system, is the author of Eight Men Out, the only book ever written dealing extensively with the infamous world series fix.

In 1919, eight members of the pennant winning Chicago White Sox team conspired with gamblers to throw the world series. The scandal episode and its implications are the focus for a UMass history course. Asinof will address the students in this course, and all interested University and Five College "fans" are cordially invited to attend.

FIREBALL — There will be an informal game of fireball tonight on the intramural fields behind Boyden. This will be the third and last fireball game on the UMass campus. All are invited to attend. The game should start at about 10 p.m.

Gazelles host Ephwomen

By NICK KOTSOPOULOS
Collegian Staff

With the early season glitters now behind them, and a victory under its belt, the UMass women's lacrosse team will be after its second straight win of the young 1977 season, when the Gazelles host Williams College in a 3 p.m. contest to be played at the NOPE field.

The Minutewomen, currently 1-0-1 on the season, are coming off of a convincingly 17-2 victory over Smith College on Tuesday. In that game Julie Hall, Nancy O'Neil and Carrie Nickerson netted four goals apiece to pace the UMass offensive attack.

However, even though the Gazelles completely dominated every phase of the game, coach Frank Garahan will be looking for a little bit better defensive play by the Minutewomen.

"Our defense wasn't really tested that severely against Smith," Garahan said. "We played solidly in the first half, but in the second half we seemed to let up a little and i'd like to see us play a good solid defensive game for both halves."

Garahan was pleased with the offensive play of the team, particularly the fastbreak it used so successfully against Smith.

"That was the difference between our first two games," Garahan said. "In the first game when we tied Northeastern, we were visibly nervous and we weren't looking for the fastbreak. But against Smith we were more relaxed and we always looked for the quick outlet pass."

So far this season, the Gazelles have scored 26 goals while holding their opponents to only 11. Hall is the leading goal scorer with nine in only two games, followed by Nickerson and O'Neil with five apiece and Evie Sneeden who has four.

Judy Kennedy and Cindy Hartstone have also done a good offense job for Garahan so far this season, chipping in with a couple of goals between them.

Garahan will probably be using everybody on the team once again as he did in the Smith game. If he sticks to his past game plan, he will also probably split the goaltending chores between Mary Murray and Robin Jennings, who have both done a fine job.

The women's lacrosse team will be looking to extend their unbeaten streak to three when they host Williams College this afternoon. (Staff photo by Jay Saret)

Tigers edge Sox

BOSTON [UPI] — Rusty Staub and rookie Steve Kemp slugged solo home runs to support the combined eight-hit pitching of three Detroit pitchers last night as the Tigers snapped a three-game losing streak with a 3-2 victory over the Boston Red Sox.

Staub belted his in the third inning to give the Tigers a 2-1 lead, while Kemp blasted his solo shot 390 feet into the Detroit bullpen in right field in the sixth for what proved to be the winning run. It was the third homer for both.

Aurelio Rodriguez drove home the Tigers' first run with a second-inning single after Milt May had doubled.

Vern Ruhle gained his second victory against one loss with eighth-inning relief help from Steve Foucault and John Hiller. Ruhle gave up a first-inning homer to Jim Rice, his first, and allowed singles to Rick Burleson and Denny Doyle to open the eighth before departing.

Hiller, who struck out the side in the ninth, gave up an RBI-grounder to Carl Yastrzemski in gaining credit for his first save.

Luis Tiant, 1-1, took the loss for Boston.

seeking her third win without a loss. The only change in the UMass lineup will feature Pat Oski in right field. Oski had a triple and a round-tripper in the two games against Westfield and UMass needs hot bats in the lineup.

A year ago, the UMass varsity dropped two games to the Chiefs. They hope to improve their current record to seven wins against no losses. The Springfield game should also provide a good warm-up for the upcoming UConn and Bridgewater State games.

The JV softball team will also travel to Springfield to face the Chiefs in a game starting at 4:15. UMass improved its record to 2-1 on Tuesday with a thrilling last-inning victory over Smith. Karen O'Laughlin will get the starting pitching assignment and Joyce Gresl will replace O'Laughlin in left-field.

"Springfield will be a tough game for us," commented Thompson, "but the team is confident that they can come through with their seventh straight win. We're going to be tough to beat!"

Diamondmen set for Fairfield tilt

By MIKE BERGER
Collegian Staff

Momentum will be the key this afternoon as Dick Bergquist's diamondmen aim to make it three in a row as they take on Fairfield University. Game time at Lorden Field will be 3:00.

The Minutemen, now 11-13, are coming off a double victory win over Dartmouth Tuesday which saw the offense explode for 21 runs. In each game UMass combined power hitting and aggressive base running, to overwhelm the Dartmouth Green with a seven-run fourth inning in game one while coming from behind game two with a six-run third.

Fairfield, presently ranked fourth in New England, comes into Lorden Field with an overall 10-8 record. They are 8-3 in northern play, having gone on a similar Florida trip as UMass.

"Scouting reports on them are scarce, but they are a vastly improved team since we last played them last year," said Bergquist. Behind Tom Nigro, and Jeff Reardon, the Minutemen took a doubleheader, sweeping Fairfield 8-5 and 11-0 in action last year.

"Fairfield had a very disappointing team last year and have rebuilt. They want a shot at the playoffs," Bergquist said.

Freshman Doug Welenc will start today's game for the Minutemen. Welenc who relieved first game starter and winner Jerry Erb in Tuesday's game against Dartmouth, came on in the fifth inning and only gave up a homerun. Other than that hit, Welenc was untouchable as he struck out four in four innings while picking up the save for Erb.

The 6'2 righhander from Greenfield is making a comeback from a back injury which kept him out of the starting rotation for two weeks. In five games he has pitched 21 1-3 innings for a 3.38 ERA, with 21 strikeouts.

"Doug's back is much better but he still has some pain at times. With six games within one week, our pitchers might be a little tired so we'll probably start Welenc and then come in with relievers Dave Tewhill and Chris Kirby," said Bergquist.

Statistically, the team's hitting which has plagued them on its previous 1-5 losing streak is anything but mediocre on paper.

Freshman Mike McEvilly leads the team with a .347 batting average having banged out five hits in Tuesday's doubleheader. In 23 games, McEvilly has four homeruns, 25 hits, and 18 RBI's.

Other .300 others on the team are infielder Ed Skribiski (.341) and designated hitter-catcher John Czerapowicz (.310). Skribiski leads the team in total hits having collected 31 with 11 RBI's, nine doubles, four triples, and two homeruns. Czerapowicz, having batted in 20 games in 58 at-bats has three triplets, two homeruns, ten RBI's and leads the team in stolen bases.

Two thirds of the team are over the .270 mark with regular shortstop Jim Cullen, centerfielder Paul Abramowicz, and catcher Charlie Ciccone hovering around the .285 mark.

"Hitting with men on base has been our problem during that losing streak. But Tuesday against Dartmouth we snapped out of it as several of our regulars came through with timely hitting, said Bergquist.

"We still have time to do something before the year is out and if we can win the game today against Fairfield and the doubleheader with Maine on Saturday, we'll be right in the thick of things again."

Sixers sink C's

PHILADELPHIA [UPI] — Julius Erving scored 30 points and Henry Bibby added 22 last night to lead the Philadelphia 76ers to a 113-101 victory over the Boston Celtics to even their NBA Eastern Conference semifinals at 1-1.

The best-of-seven series now goes to Boston for game 3 Friday night.

In the first half, the 76ers held a 15-point lead but the Celtics cut it to three before the sixers ran out again to a 57-45 halftime advantage.

The 76ers stretched their lead to 18, at 67-49 after 2:25 of the third period. The Celtics never got closer than seven points the remainder of the game.

After Charlie Scott hit two free throws with 10:19 remaining in the game the sixers went on an 11-3 tear to take a 97-82 lead with 6:01 remaining and virtually iced the game.

Celtics' coach Tom Heinsohn was ejected from the game after picking up two technical fouls in the last minute of the first half by referee Richie Powers.

Lloyd Free added 17 points and George McGinnis 16 for the 76ers. John Havlicek led the Celtics with 29 points and Dave Cowens added 21.

Batswomen face Chiefs; hope to remain unbeaten

By PAT McGRATH
Collegian Staff

The UMass softball team will attempt to extend their record-breaking six-game winning skein when they travel to Springfield to face a tough chief squad today at 2:30.

The Minutewomen are coming off an impressive doubleheader sweep against the Owls of Westfield State. In the first game of that twinbill, the softballers exploded for a season's high 17 runs. Freshman Gail Carter picked up her first varsity victory with a shutout in that game. In the nightcap, however, their bats cooled off as they squeezed by the Owls by a score of 3-2.

"We have to get our bats going again like the first Westfield game in order to beat Springfield," explained UMass coach Dianne Thompson.

The Chiefs will be the toughest competition to date for the undefeated Minutewomen. They sport a 4-1 record, with their only loss coming against Bridgewater State in their last outing, so the softballers hope to catch Springfield with their morale down.

The Chiefs will assign the pitching duties to Carol Johnson, who has compiled two victories without a defeat. Springfield has competed in doubleheaders versus Central Connecticut and Westfield State, with sweeps over both of them. Their record is marred only by a 4-3 loss to the Bears of Bridgewater, whom the Minutewomen have not yet faced.

The psyched UMass team will send senior co-captain Gail Matthews to the mound. Thus far her earned run average is a phenomenal 0.50, and she will be

The Batko Decision

Just as fist-fighting in the NHL persists because it is punishable by a light slap on the wrist and being sent to bed without dinner, so a new violent sports precedent has been set with U.S. district Judge John Curtin's lenient sentencing of Marian Batko, an unemployed steelworker who mailed a postcard threatening to blow up Howard Cosell on national television. Batko's punishment did not include a jail term because Curtin figured Batko's elderly mother needed him around the house. As Cosell, himself, would say, the deplorable nature of this threat clearly negates any inherent merit in the choice of its recipient.

Moreover, the decision provides a license for every crank who owns a pen and has half a reason for not being jailed. Sure enough, a slew of these postcards were mailed to the Collegian, because their deranged authors didn't know where else to send them. The following are just a few of the sick postal pieces nurtured by the landmark Batko Decision:

Dear Mayor White,

This is the last straw! I am sick of sharing Boston Garden playoff dates with a second-rate hockey club. I didn't like the Adamses and I don't like their Division. I want my own arena.

To show that I mean business, I have instructed one of my employes to drive a taxi through Boston, picking up residents and delivering them to me. This Friday at sunrise an innocent person will be pelted to death with basketballs. Henceforth, one hostage per day will meet a similar demise until a new sports complex is completed. Make it spacious because I have claustrophobia. Can't stand being locked in small buildings.

Oh.... and Mayor, we have your wife.

Irv Levin

Dear Carl,

Don't you think I know what you've been doing out in left field? Leering at all those girls in the bleachers with their skimpy halters! Well let me tell you this, mumblemouth, you may be scoring at Fenway, but you sure can't cut the mustard at home.

If I ever see you jump into the stands after another ball, I'm gonna put Big Yaz cyanide in your Big Yaz bread, and no court in the world will convict me. They'd think it was the bread alone that did the damage.

Carol Yastrzemski

Hey Park,

My tubercular canary and I were watching you make a fool of yourself against the Kings Tuesday and we got an idea. Maybe if you hadn't been there to deflect in L.A.'s winning goal, Boston would be in the semis by now.

In short, bozo, the B's may be going to Hollywood, but you're not. I'm looking for you, Park, and when I find you, you won't be a member of the Bruins anymore — you'll be a dismember. Bobby Orr may be a cripple but he's still an All-Star defensemen compared to you.

You stink, Park. Your slapshot stinks, your breath stinks and your mother stinks.

A Friend

Dear Harry M. Stevens,

Having recently encountered some of the most nauseating hot dogs I've ever tasted, I feel it only fair to warn you of your Impending Doom.

No, don't try to apologize. I know you've grown attached to your Impending, but you both knew it would have to end Sometime. And now that your Sometime is sooner or later the Impending can't be far behind.

I only regret failing Algebra and being allergic to bread, water and rutabagas.

A Movie Viewer's Guide To Happy Movie Viewing

By John Matthew

There are few worse feelings than sitting for two hours through a lousy movie. You patiently wait for something to happen and then realize that the only thing to look forward to is the end credits and house lights. It's even more of a 'down-ender' if you've expended three dollars.

So, to avoid such a trauma, one should review all the available information before making a decision concerning your movie of the evening. The best information is to be found in the film's credits; those individuals responsible for the making of the film (director, producer, writer). These credits can be found in any large ad, and they are factual.

It is unwise to get too excited about any movie from interesting 'clips' on television. The best example of a film distributor using a one minute TV ad to attract interest was in the promotion of 'The Man Who Fell To Earth'. In one minute, the entire meritous sequences were flashed. Then seeing the movie, one concluded that the rest was a 'dog', leaving the impression that it should have been released as a short-short.

But such is the advertising-manipulation game. One shouldn't believe anything one sees on television.

Reviewing a newspaper ad for a film, one sees the stars' names followed by a mass of microscopic print. These are the people whose names rarely sell tickets, yet they are the ones who physically make the movie. To be familiar with these people and their work will assist one in making the 'best' choice in movie viewing.

If a distributor is going to pay top dollar for a big ad, why not look it over. It can be very revealing. Look for the following; 1) See what company made the film. An ad may read, 'Black Sunday, a Paramount Picture'; or it could read, 'The Eagle Has Landed, a Columbia Pictures release from ITC'. (ITC is a British entertainment corporation) These two lines do not mean the same thing. When a film is billed as a 'Paramount Picture' or 'Paramount presents', it means the film company, Paramount, has invested money in the film's production. If it reads 'A Columbia Release', the company has merely acquired the distribution rights to the film, and they had no say or creative imput in the making of the film.

The reason a film maker will work without a distributor's coin is two fold. First, the producers may have had great faith in the film and were willing to carry the financing load themselves (and through film investors). Otherwise the major studios had no interest in financing the film, which is usually a good indicator of its' quality, (but then no one was all that interested in 'Rocky').

The major American film companies are Columbia, Universal, MGM, United Artists, 20th Century Fox, and Paramount, If any of these companies are involved in a film's production, at least the film will have the 'Hollywood Touch', in terms of appearance and technical quality. This does not imply that the film itself is any good, rather it can be interpreted that someone with 'production knowledge' saw potential in the project. Whether this potential was realized or even existed is another matter.

2) Beware of switching roles. Many name actors and actresses now want a 'creative extension', and turn to directing. Though some performers make the transition, the adage states, 'let those who know how to make movies, make the movies'.

When examining an ad, check to see if a performer is doing more than acting. If so, one should be wary, as film making involves perspectives and this can be easily lost if only one person is creatively dominant. Furthermore most actors are not trained in the field of directing. Despite wide belief that 'anyone can be a film director', not anyone can be good at it.

3) Look for critic's opinions. Positive critic reaction is a film's major selling point, and critics' remarks are often helpful in determining the quality of a film. A large ad without such remarks can be taken to mean no one has anything good to say about the film. An attempt should be made to associate the critics with their publication. Clearly a plus rating from Vincent Canby of The New York Times is much more meaningful than one from The National Enquirer.

The preceding is all somewhat promotional. The determinants of a film's quality are the people involved in its production. To the viewer, a movie is a short entertainment release. To movie men, it's a job, and as such, they take great pride in their work.

Individually, the best directors, producers, cameramen, and writers are total genuises. This is no exaggeration.. Think about what a good movie does. It removes the viewer from their present world, and slips them into one where they feel for people they have never met, experiences wild excitement in a darkened room; in short, it totally affects one's emotional being. To do this is quite an accomplishment. It would be wise to try to remember the names below. These artists have mastered their craft to the level of consistancy, and in most cases, not at the expense of originality.

(Note: This is a short list of Hollywood's most active and-or most promising talents).

Screenwriters — The writer is obviously essential in the making of a good film. Yet, one has to feel for these creators, as once they sell their scripts, they have little control over the final product. Many writers argue that the good scripts were ruined by hack directors, while many directors are forced to work extra hard in trying to make a good film with a lousy script. This is the typical "Hollywood Exchange".

Notables:

Paddy Chaefsky; (credits: Network, Hospital, Marty). Chaefsky is a total writer. His scripts take the form of examinations of institutions and human emotion. When one goes to see a Chaefsky-written film one should be mentally alert. Not only are his satires thought-provoking, but his point of view jumps off the screen and literally "bites". "Network" is perhaps one of the best written films of all time.

William Goldman (credits: Marathon Man, Butch Cassidy, All the President's Men). It seems that William Goldman's name pops up on every major film. The man is not short of work. He is the smooth translator of semi-intellectual thoughts, which he passes on to the average American viewer. This is why his scripts are in such high demand. His films sell. He takes no chances with his stories, and as a result, his story line, as in Marathon Man, sometimes gets very thin and almost unjustifiable. One wonders what he could create if he spent less time "manufacturing" feature screen-plays, and more time developing an important work.

Producers — With demise of "Hollywood's studio system" in the late 60's, independent producers are becoming more important in the American film industry. The producer usually buys a script and then develops the property, choosing directors, actors, technicians, etc. and generally handles the business end of the production. Others are merely film company appointees, hired to run the show, but those do who develop films and seek out ideas, are largely responsible for the type of movies that are made.

Notables:

Robert Evans (credits: Marathon Man, Black Sunday, Chinatown). From a personality standpoint, Bob Evans is hard to take. He resembles an arrogant little boy playing poker with the "big guys". Although he's toned down his act in recent years, he still appears to be a man saying "I know movies, I am great at making movies, I'm always busy making movies". Still, Evans works very closely with his directors and takes great care in who he hires. With the talent he has working on his films, they should be nothing less than brilliant. This is his talent. He goes after "names", brings them together, and in the process, gives them a chance to make expressive films, For this reason, Evans is an important producer. He averages one film a year and it shows. His works reflect a lot of serious work and are high-grade commercial entertainment, though short on the thinking end.

Dino DeLaurentis (credits: King Kong, The Shootist, Three Days of the Condor). DeLaurentis is one of Hollywood's most active producers. His company can produce as many as five

Talking Film

Frank Galvin is a Boston based independent film maker. His many documentary credits include editor on such award winning films as 'Bitter Lemons,' the Nicolas Ray film, 'I'm A Stranger Here Myself,' and most recently as associate producer on 'Hollywood On Trial,' a 1976 Academy Award nominee for Best Documentary.

BTS: You're a respected documentary film maker but I'm curious about your feelings on Hollywood's commercial movies.

Galvin: I don't go to a lot of movies. Partly because of the weak product in contemporary film, and partly because I'm getting pissed off at audiences. Going to movies is expensive, and there's not much to see. If 'King Kong,' a remake of a 1932 film, is the savior of the industry, then that says something, and the audiences are so bad that during 'Cuckoo's Nest' I had to leave. I like 'Carrie' for its style and Sissy Spacek's performance. Barry Lyndon was grossly overlooked in this country. It didn't get good press or runs. I watch a lot of oldies from the 30's and 40's on TV. The craft comes out in those films.

BTS: Did you see 'Taxi Driver'?

Galvin: Yes and I wasn't impressed. I'm so sick of seeing people being blown apart on the screen. The story was full of holes and it's an example of film making to see who's quickest with the bloodbag.

BTS: Why did you choose film as a career? What was the appeal?

Galvin: I always loved movies. When I was young I went two or three times a week. I got interested in still photography in the Navy and then went to work as a librarian at the Harvard Business School. I drifted into the industry. I just wanted to break away from the library job into something with film, anything but cameras. I have nothing to do with motion picture cameras, for reasons that are too heavy.

BTS: You never thought, "Is this the career for me?"

Galvin: I never asked is this is my profession. It was not as great then, competitively. In the early 60's when I started out you could count the number of film editors in Boston on one hand.

BTS: So how do you feel about the expressive film makers, those who downplay the rigid technical approach?

Galvin: A technical background is important when one is so knowledgeable that it doesn't get in the way of your film making. You don't think, where do I put the camera? or how do I do it? It becomes second nature. You forget about it.

BTS: Where did you learn your skills?

Galvin: I was a self-taught film editor. I learned from mistakes on my own films.

BTS: What do you see the American film industry becoming?

Galvin: More and more work will be done by independents. Look at 'Rocky,' a studio bought it but it was an independent production. There will be more of these independent productions done outside of L.A. and more in Europe as well.

BTS: Have you ever worked in Hollywood?

Galvin: When I was 21 years old I went to California for four months, and then came back to Boston. Since then I've been in Hollywood five days in the last 15 years. You run big risks out there, burning out too fast. They want hit after hit after hit. Look at Bogdanovich, he's all burned out.

BTS: So now that you have the impressive credentials, what do you want to do?

Galvin: I'd like to edit a good fiction film, a dramatic feature. I get great pleasure editing other people's movies. Sometimes their conception is good, other times not so good. My job is to assist them with their vision on the screen, in a coherent way. Rhythm, flow, lucidity, clearness, it's what you want to put on the screen.

BTS: That can't be too far off, then what?

Galvin: To direct a creative feature film, an incredible fantasy. I wouldn't get involved in a Bergman kind of film, more a Kubrick in style and subject matter, filled with surrealism and fantasy.

BTS: You taught documentary film making at the Film School, you know about young people's dreams of a Hollywood career. You've been there. Is it possible?

Galvin: If you're diligent and don't rush too much, I'd say one can make a living in film. It's easy to get into the industry, through schools, but it's not very easy for jobs, especially with the economic conditions the way they are, and the generation of the 60's out there looking for film work. People forget that Hollywood is just the tip of the iceberg. There's a tremendous amount of production outside of Hollywood, with commercials, medical and industrial films and such. This is the bread and butter work, but the big successes are few and far between. Hollywood's the big time and to make it is a combination of perserverence and luck.

J.M.

—Movies—

features per year. His appeal lies in the deliverance of potentially intriguing, exciting, motion pictures which always fall short of promise. Currently, he is working on the new Ingmar Berman film, "The Serpent's Egg". Dino wants to make a buck first, and a respectable film sometime later.

Michael and Julia Phillips (credits: Taxi Driver, The Sting). Young and perceptive, the philosophy of the Phillips couple centers on the "new wave" of Hollywood talent, the young young film maker. Previously, one had to serve years of an apprenticeship in the hope of making a feature film. Now, young talents are given the opportunity early, as the industry has changed, and this idea is meeting with critical and popular favor. The Phillips' are in close contact with these people and seem determined to continue working in this direction. They are currently producing "Close Encounters of the Third Kind", a big-budgeted sci-fi pic directed by Steven Spielberg, starring Richard Dreyfus and Francois Truffaut, with special effects by Douglas Trumball (2001). Quite a production package!

Cinematographyrs — The credit, Director of Photography, is one vastly underrated except among directors. Any director will tell you that a good camera man is worth his weight in gold. He is the man who gives a film its physical appearance. Colors, angles, lighting, film stock all subtly affect the viewer. There are many good cinematographers but the greatest of them all was Freddie Young. "You Only Live Twice" (1967) was a visual masterpiece, one that could only have been created by the master himself. At eighty years of age it is unlikely that he will work again, but his work remains the most striking in film history.

Robert Surtees (The Sting, Star is Born, Butch Cassidy) is the heir apparent to the aging king. His work is excellent, elegant and rich. The encomium to Young in not intended to down-grade Surtees, it's merely unlikely that anyone will ever approach the former's brilliance.

Directors — Film directors come and go. Not only must their works be publically accepted, but the director must be personally satisfied. This environment has lead to many a feud between director and studio. It's not an easy job. A good director must have a clear conception of what he's doing, be able to ease creative differences between cast and crew, maintain shooting schedules, develop a blend of technical and expressive style, and on and on and on. It never ends. A good director has the ability to accomplish all of it. A great director can do more in terms of creativity and approach. Naturally, there aren't many great film directors. Many are hired by producers to bring a film in on budget, being their pawn, simply moving actors around and shooting the film the way the producer wants it. This lack of creative freedom is not a pleasant working situation, but when an unknown director is faced with either accepting this or not working, the decision becomes more difficult. Few directors have this creative freedom or the "right to final cut" as it is called. One must prove that one's films are profitable and as long as they are "hot", a film company will write a blank check for production. Movies are big business and a few million dollars isn't a substantial amount when one speaks in terms of a potential hundred-million dollar profit.

Notables: "The Young Directors

Francis Ford Coppola (credits — The Godfather, Parts I and II, The Conversation). Coppola, at this point is probably Hollywood's finest director. His style reflects a total integration of the French and Hollywood cinemas. Coppola's films most closely resemble the 1940 era of motion pictures, with contemporary approaches to concepts and subjects. A very powerful director-producer, his current project is the twenty-million dollar Vietnam pic, "The Apocalypse", starring Marlon Brando.

William Friedkin (credits: The French Connection, The Exorcist). William Friedkin is the epitomy of the Hollywood technical director, except he's the best. Friedkin knows how to make movies yet they lack personality. He resembles the "flashy kid" who's films make big money, but with his "name", Friedkin should develop a project to display exactly the kind of film maker he is. Perhaps the soon-to-be-released "Sorcerer", starring Roy Scheider, will reveal some "substitive flash".

Steven Spielberg (credits; Jaws, Duel). Spielberg is trying to live down the "childhood prodigy" tag, having directed "Jaws", the all-time box office champ, at age twenty-seven. It appears he may with the film "Close Encounters of the Third Kind", the most ambitious product in the fifty year history of Columbia pictures. Spielberg's forte is his visual display. His shots have tremendous power. His future would appear to be more than bright, but he runs the danger of being a victim of the rising pressure that Hollywood places on its talents to continue to produce blockbuster hits. Many others have burned out under such pressure, but Spielberg seems comfortably removed from any pressure resting on his $4,000,000 cut from "Jaws". Whether he continues to expand his talents in future productions is a question, but one that will be answered with the release of "Close Encounters", which promises to be a fascinating motion picture.

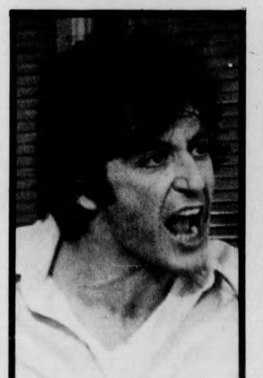
Martin Scorcese (credits: Taxi Driver, Mean Streets, Alice Doesn't Live Here Anymore). Scorcese's is best known for his relationship with Robert DeNiro and this is one which is continuing with the production of "New York, New York", a big-band, musical drama, co-starring Liza Minelli. Scorcese's heart is in the city of New York and his films evoke the personalities of closely-packed population. His work concentrates less on physical action and center more on human trial and emotion. His brilliance is with his ability to catch this while totally exploiting the environment of his characters. As in "Taxi Driver" and "Mean Streets", one can argue that he loses control, to the point of his films being mentally bothersome. This complaint may be legitimate, but it provides further proof as to the power of his work.

David Bowie (film credits: none). It may be in poor taste to mention this outrageous rock star with the aforementioned, but Bowie, despite his sometimes psychological variations, has a strong sense of imagery, concept and production. This has been characteristic of his music, and with his move into motion pictures, one hasn't any idea what to expect. Don't sell this man short. His first film project will be "Young Americans" based on his LP of the same name. If he moves carefully and thoughtfully, one may find Bowie's film works fascinating, coherent, and rich in imagery. Time will tell if he can bring his act down to the level of the rest of the world, but Bowie does have the desire and he may surprise a lot of people.

Thinking About Pacino

By Trish Mastendino

Few of us have failed to witness the enigmatic quality of Al Pacino's performances in either "Godfather Part I and II", "Serpico", or the actor's last movie, "Dog Day Afternoon", but many of us (myself included) may have failed to notice that behind that smokey Italian image dwells a talented and versatile actor. Pacino is one of those rare actors who exercise an uncanny amount of charismatic charm laced with the subtlety of a deeper man; traits which both enhance and penetrate the characters he portrays.



In spite of a somewhat limited and seemingly endless string of junkie and hoodlum-type roles (remember "Panic in Needle Park"??) so familiar to his initial stage and screen parts, he's managed to convey a genuine emotional intensity through his dramatic executions that extends beyond the greasepaint and cardboard. Pacino's Michael Corleone of "Godfather" fame could have become easy prey for a typlified characterization of "innocent falls victim to society and crime" syndrome, but who could have realized anything more powerful than the tremendous inner struggle and eventual decision so perceptively interpreted by Pacino? Even Pacino's "Serpico" was such a sensitive mixture of idealistic concepts tempered with society's realities that it succeeded in surmounting the obvious pit-

In Defense of

Fellini's Casanova

By Rich Pioli

A carnival embellishes the Rialto and the Venetian skyline is transformed into great washes of opulent color as hundreds of costumes, nuns, prostitutes, gondoliers, priests cheer on the blazing fireworks that kiss the edge of the black sky; the giant head of some antediluvian goddess is lifted out of the lagoon and all cheer the unearthly reality of this magical celebration.

So, before one has sat in his theater seat for five minutes, Fellini's Casanova has stolen you away from your ordinary and fearfully realistic self. What you are about to share is the pleasure of experiencing the transformation of dream into film, a considerable undertaking Fellini has taught us to expect always.

This time Fellini has made a different demand on his own imagination; he has made a film about an unlovable creature whose human reality is so thin as to make him resemble only the automatic physical reflexes that accompany love without the essence: "I made the film because I signed the contract." After reading Casanova's Memoirs Fellini was forced to alter all previous perceptions which had originally induced him to film Casanova.

"There is nothing in the Memoirs...nothing! Nothing of nature, animals, children, trees; no descriptions of the moments of a day. He roamed the world, and it is as if he never moved from his bed."

Fellini's Casanova is therefore tragically reduced to hugh portions of animal sex and promiscuity while the scenery changes wildly underneath him. His lustful companions are various and highly entertaining; a giggling nun, a large breasted woman, a woman so tall as to excite Casanova away from committing suicide, and ultimately, even a mechanical doll becomes party to a romantic romp. Throughout all this array of natural impulses and lustful interludes Casanova remains a barren lifeless stranger until age makes him weary.

Although the mood of Casanova leans to that side of Fellini which prefers the pure fantasy and cold deadly minimalism of Satyricon it is also in many ways a much healthier and positive film as all of his post-Satyricon films have been.

Fellini's control of fantasy can be chilling, here it is only remorseful. What human essence his protagonist here lacks Fellini compensates for with supplying every other character and scene with twice as much cleverness and creativity. His secondaries stare out of their existences to reach at you through the screen, beyond the dark glasses; his vinyl plastic stormy sea dazzles the viewer with its imagination and the totally renovated rendition of a natural phenomenon. Despite any vacuum of feeling one clearly feels the more visionary and beautiful imagination in the composition of these moments (which cannot be found in other films). They make the film whole. These are the times when we must read whole books for one great passage.

Fellini's compositional paradoxes have been clearly discernable since "8½" where the imagination was the theme of the film; its protagonist clearly desired to escape his reality. Fellini, since then, has succeeded in his alternative world and its total realization. The imagination has always been a gold-paved path to happiness and Fellini has garnished the forests along the way with his own ornaments. When a film by Fellini is released we must address his fantasy by calling on our own desires and imagination to cover the remainder of the distance between his fantasy and our real world. You can only enrich your own life by experiencing that which you won't find anywhere else. Fellini's art is that very special ordering of sense experience which requires visionary imagination and, it takes the receptive imaginative mind to realize its own freedom and understand the perception that leads to self-development.

Toward the end of his life Casanova wrote his Memoirs, perhaps as a last gesture to justify his meaningless life. In the final scenes as the old man mortifies his young ridiculers through intelligence, there is a transformed power of beingness as the stunning oration electrifies his listeners. His last lines are true to Fellini: "I'll never see my beloved Venice again.....last night I had a dream..." First the real, then the more satisfying imagined. No totally depressing closing. The weight of failure creates its other existence.

This movie must be seen with effort, proper vision. It exacts from you that which adults have less and less use for in this self-preoccupied, alienated world — never leave your imagination at home when you go to the movies.

Bergman's Cries and Whispers

Love and Other Emotions

By Paul Lawrence

The projector light broke onto the screen. The first scene the audience saw was a room where a women was resting in bed. She lay very still. For a long time she was the only thing on the screen. The audience began to get restless. One couple in front got up and left. Thus, the showing of Ingmar Bergman's "Cries and Whispers," began.

"Cries and Whispers" tells a tragic, yet deeply moving story. The film is extremely complex and makes an effort to depict emotions most people have only read about, let alone experienced. Because of this, it was not surprising to hear many people ask their friends what they thought the film meant after it was over.

Bergman's movies differ from anything you will ever see. They don't feature the John Wayne "good guys win in the end," the exciting, dashing and masculine Clint Eastwood or have the happy love-success theme of a Barbara Streisand movie.

Instead, Bergman's films feature characters that are constantly silhouetted by shadows. While "Cries and Whispers" was filmed in color, most of his films are done in black and white. His stories do not progress smoothly. "Cries and Whispers" jumped forward and flashed backward, bouncing from reality to fantasy. Additionally, Bergman's films do not end pleasantly. Consequently, many people who attend a Bergman movie will not go back to another.

Television has a great deal to do with this. It feeds the visual media fan countless murders and robberies, sandwiched between nonsensical commercials, but does little to prepare one for Bergman's expressions of the different degrees of love and other emotions T.V. has long forgotten. Can the same person who willingly watches (and believes) fragile Farrah-Fawcett Majors do battle with the most ruthless criminals be asked to watch Bergman's ordinary looking characters for two hours?

Television has shaped our perception of reality. We don't want to see a movie about love. The violence, the deaths, and the ingenious methods by which people inflict pain on one another — this is what we want to see. Only a short while ago "The Eiger Sanction," a Clint Eastwood movie with no real plot, sold out three shows at the CCA, but "Cries and Whispers," which won four New York Film Critic's Awards, was attended by only a few hundred people.

Americans dislike Swedish born Ingmar Bergman's films because they can't comprehend them. They fail to understand his films because nobody has analyzed and explained them to the viewers. Why does each scene end with a close-up of a face and then dissolve into a solid frame of red? What does the color red symbolize in the movie? Blood? Death? Communism? The average movie goer does not know. In Bergman's Films, there is no Jim Mckay or Barbara Walters to make these complex things simple for us.

"Cries and Whispers" is set in the late 19th century. It is the story of four women. Agnes, who is dying, her two sisters, Karin and Maria and their servant, Anna. Agnes' long illness has brought Maria and Karin home, to help her through her final days. She is bedridden and they take turns sitting with her.

The movie centers around the relationship between the women. Are the sisters attending Agnes because they love her or because they feel they must? What kind of love should Maria and Karin share as sisters? Maria would like it to be a touching, physical love. Karin, a cold, strong woman, prefers to be distant.

Agnes' death is the most unforgettable event in the movie and is one of the most painful scenes ever filmed.

The three women are awakened in the middle of the night when Agnes begins to breath "strangely." Her breathing is coarse and strained. The sound she makes while attempting to breath is as upsetting as scraping fingernails on a blackboard. Each breath lasts an eternity.

The two sisters leave to find the doctor, while Anna remains with Agnes. The clock show five hours have passed when the sisters return without the doctor. But Agnes does not die then. Her breathing returns to normal. The three women wash her and put her in a clean nightgown. It is just when the worse seems to be over that she dies silently.

Anna is most effected by Agnes' death. Through her eyes Maria and Karin never loved Agnes. Soon after Agnes dies the estate is sold and Anna is coldly dismissed. But fittingly it is Anna who keeps Agnes' diary, the ultimate symbol of love, when Maria and Karin have settled the money matters and go separate ways.

DOLLAR NITE AND HOW TO SPEND IT

By E. Patrick McQuaid
and Craig Roche

AMHERST CINEMA

If you're stalking the silver screen the Amherst area is alive with game. In the center of the town, on Amity Street is Amherst's only movie theatre, the Amherst Cinema which has catered to the college crowd for years. You can purchase a Student's ID card that will let you in to all the showings for a buck and of course there's the sacred dollar night(s); Monday and Tuesday.

Most of the screenings are double-feature old standards as well as second and third time-arounds and foreign favourites. They are well advertised and centrally located so it's fairly easy finding what's on screen at Amherst Cinema, otherwise give them a call for listings at 253-5426.

MOUNTAIN FARMS FOUR

Heading out of town on Rt. 9 toward Northampton you cannot miss the Mountain Farms Mall within which lay the Mountain Farms Four (584-9153). A few short years ago the spot was a farmers field. Now it's concrete and plastic, good for an occasional stroll, but little else. The theatre finally got around to erecting a marquee last spring, but they still don't light it up. And it's located in a spot well after you've passed the Mall entrance if you're driving west on 9.

I've seen about ten films there in two years and it seems as if each one broke in the middle at least once. The films there are generally new, but not often first run, When almost all theaters have Monday and Tuesday religiously designated as $1.00 nights, the management at Mtn. Farms 4 touches you for an extra 25c and makes you arrive for an early show around 4:30 p.m.

GONE WITH THE WIND

The Campus Cinemas, just over the line in Hadley, financially collapsed after a short spell last fall. It certainly had promise, however. The owners of the reknown Orson Welles complex in Cambridge had purchased the place and changed the structure and subject matter both on and off the screen. In one typical week there would be a first run feature, a double hit feature, and a classic double feature.

Just why they closed down is a bit of a mystery but many speculate that because students found it difficult to get to the Campus Cinemas without their own transportation they just couldn't survive. Without student patronage the cinemas would not find an audience in this area.

Just down Rte 9 a bit further is the abandoned Hadley Drive-in and veggie restaurant. Apparently the demand for popcorn, which they refused to sell ended their days abruptly last fall.

If you follow Rte 9 along into Northampton you'll find that the city hosts a number of fine movie theatres.

CALVIN THEATRE

The Calvin Theatre (584-2310) is located just around the corner from Rte 9 in the center of Northampton. It's an old, comfortable house that shows a fairly typical selection of movies.

This is the working person's theater of Northampton where you'll see Disney's latest, "Godfather, Part 3" or whatever is picked up for mass distribution. I'm not slighting the place.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC

The Academy of Music, "near the gates to Smith College" is on Rte 9 — Main Street right after the center of business.

The Academy (584-8435) is a gem, a fine old theater like there may have been in your town when you were just beginning to go to movies. If there was no place, like it in your past, make the Academy of Music in your future. It is the sixth oldest operating theater in the nation. That coupled with the good films, art films, and the American Theater film series, and the absolutely gorgeous decor of the place make it an experience you won't forget. Last year the Academy also housed a fine concert series that hopefully will pick up again this year. The Academy is a piece of our nation's history, having sheltered the Barrymores and that's fine enough company for us to keep, isn't it?

MAJESTIC THEATRE

A notable omission we are making here is the Majestic Theater (527-2346) in Easthampton, which is the area's house of pornography. We can't recall an X-rated flick that wasn't pretty dull after the first six inches; the Majestic at least gets credit for not showing the same ones over and over. Maybe they just change the names and the faces remain the same. Who could tell, who's looking at those faces?

SPRINGFIELD-GREENFIELD

Springfield has a great number of theaters. Most theaters in Springfield have those cheapie daytime matinees that you skip classes to catch. Otherwise it's $3, $4, maybe $5.00 per ducat and we've yet to see the film worth that.

You can go to Showcase Cinemas in Springfielf, which shows six different films a night, or slip into Greenfield to catch a movie in the Garden Theater, one of the East's few surviving old-timey theaters. The film addict is sure to score in this area.

ALTERNATIVE CELLULOID

By E. Patrick McQuaid

Members of the Amherst Film Cooperative were looking for a permanent home base last year. They considered the Skillings' estate, the huge Victorian home that now houses the Amherst Boy's Club but it didn't work out. Nor did Kane's Nursing Home.

"Our letters must have passed each other in the mail," John Morrison said. "We wrote to the Globe asking if they would consider selling. Coincidentally they were up for sale and had sent out a bid."

According to Morrison, the manager at Pleasant Street Theatre, (586-0935) they reversed the direction of the seats increasing the size of the screen and the number of the seats.

"We can legally hold 142 people," he said. "We've got 130 seats." But much more than the physical appearance of the building has changed. "We're trying to be entirely different in the area, and by the area I mean a very large area. From Worcester to the New York border we're the only arts house."

The Pleasant Street Theatre shows first run foreign films, old classics, and is the only cinema with a children's matinee. This week the matinee is daily and is a double feature Marx Brothers bill. This coming Sunday two silent classics, Ben Hur and The Perils of Pauline Part II will be shown with live organ accompaniment, a Sunday afternoon pastimes at the Pleasant Street Theatre. All matinees begin at 1 and 3 p.m.

All tickets at the Pleasant Street Theatre are $2.00 for adults and $1.00 for children and senior citizens.

"We also sell tickets in bulk," Morrison tells us. "If you buy 5 tickets you get one free that can be used on any occasion."

"The Amherst Film Coop is no more," Morrison said, "but they're still incorporated and the papers are still there for someone to take up."

Unfortunately, to resurrect the Amherst Film Coop would also mean taking on a $750 debt. That's one reason why The Mind's Eye Cine Club has been operating out of the UMass and Hampshire College campuses.

"More money is available from lecture funds," Ron Stringer says, "and we're able to bring in visiting film makers and the admission is free."

"We are sort of a coop," he continued, "we're certainly a non-profit organization. We were originally interested in running films from the New York International Film Coop but now we're running a visiting filmmakers series."

The Mind's Eye's first program was last week at UMass with a screening of Austrian filmmakers Peter Kubelka's work including his most recent film Pause! which had its world premiere just last January at the Museum of Modern Art in New York City. Kubelka discussed his work with viewers throughout the evening and the theories of independent cinema, a concept clearly distinguishable from the industrially produced Hollywood narratives that rake in millions each year.

"Next fall," Stringer said, "we hope to be more ambitious. What we want to present is a series of independent American filmmakers as well as running the New Berlin series of German films now showing in New York through the West German Embassy. We are mostly interested in doing what's called the Whitney Museum series, a thirty-year retrospective of avente guard film. If we can get it it will be forty films. That will be seven programs of ninety minutes each."

The next two programs from Mind's Eye will both be at Hampshire College. Jonas Mekas on April 23 (8:00 p.m. in the West Lecture Hall) and Gunvor Nelson on April 25 (7:30 p.m. in the East Lecture Hall). The programs will be similar to the screening-discussion seminar of their first presentation at UMass.

There's usually a film or two showing every weekend by one campus organization or another. Many RSO (Recognized Student Organization) groups show movies for their own financial support and some excellent films drift in quite often. Check the bulletin boards in the Campus Center, particularly the glass cases outside of the Coffee Shop for posters and notices. Throughout the five colleges there are innumerable films being shown each week; pick up a Five College Calendar at the Campus Center Assistance Desk on the concourse for a fairly accurate listing of these.

For several semesters Hampshire College has been running a foreign film series on Wednesday and Friday nights showing the Fellinis, Polanskis, and Truffaults that are a necessary part of your college education. So skip out early on that evening seminar and catch the Five College bus over to Hampshire.

THE WESTERN FROM THE SILENTS TO THE SEVENTIES
By George N. Fenin and William K. Everson
Penguin Books Paperbound
$5.95

By Jack Cahill

By far, the most maligned and casually ignored genre of American film is the best known and most historically significant one: the western. The classic case of overkill has torn the Western from our affection. We have all sat through too many of the Warner Brothers TV cliches (re: Lawman, Cheyenne, Sugarfoot) and the unending parade of B, C, and D epics that comprise the television menu. As a consequence, we find it hard to recognize a classic Western work like "Red River," "The Man Who Shot Liberty Valance" or "Winchester 73."

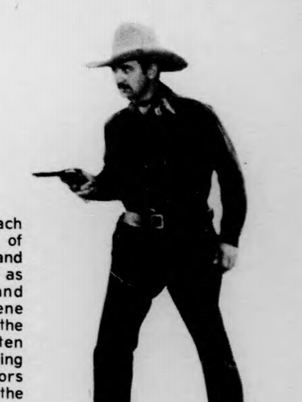
Fenin and Everson's The Western is a thorough and entertaining overview and analysis of the history of the Western movie and its components that seeks to raise our blinders to the excellences of this standard form. Originally published in 1962, this new paperbound edition updates itself to 1972. When one looks at the importance of the westerns made in those years (Soldier Blue, The Wild Bunch, McCabe and Mrs. Miller, Hombre and many others), the viability of the Western in its modern and increasingly untypical form is undeniable. The importance of this book is in the perspective it gives of the Western frontier, the American public, the economic vagaries of Hollywood and the popular view of history. A view of the western as an integral part of our society's conceptions of history and pride emerges.

The authors compare the Wild West exploits of America's legendary cowboy heroes to ancient myths and come up with some startling correspondences. Wyatt Earp's exploits are close to Hercules' labors, Custer at Little Big Horn approaches the fated doom of Oedipus and "Remember the Alamo" is a reminder of the battle of Thermopylae. The Western is the core of American legend and despite the romanticized fallaciousness of the Western movie, it has served to establish this legend in the minds of everyone in every nation from Yugoslavia to the Peoples' Republic. It is an essential film genre to consider and this book deals with it exceptionally well.

In 396 well illustrated pages, the book traces the movie western from its 1903 inception in "The Great Train Robbery" through its major early stars and directors. These early films were only a few years removed from the exploits they depicted (the actual great train robbery occurred in 1898) and many of the early auteurs like William S. Hart and Broncho Billy Anderson were a part of the cowboy experience long before they became involved with moving pictures. As a result, many of the early silents were historically accurate, if overly romanticized. Although lost to us today, the two screen stars of the Twenties, W. S. Hart and Tom Mix, were men who epitomized the cowboy that seems so fictional to us now. Hart, to whom the book is dedicated, was the noble cowboy in real life whose friends included Bat Masterson, Wyatt Earp and many famous reformed outlaws. The legendary Tom Mix was a barnstormer, deputy marshall and champion rodeo rider who fought in the Spanish American, Phillipine and Boer Wars and the Boxer Rebellion before becoming the biggest cowboy star ever.

It was during the Mix years of popularity that the western became more concerned with showy entertainment than historical drama. Fenin and Everson go on to examine the high and low points of each decade, the masterpieces of John Ford, William Wyler and William K. Howard as well as the cockeyed antics and ridiculous serials of Gene Autry, Roy Rogers and the hundred other forgotten sagebrush saints and singing gunfighters. The authors separate the wheat from the chaff, but the chaff is almost overwhelming.

An examination of the post war western's characters and moral themes leads into a short but interesting addenda on the modern Western which tries to combine "El Topo," "Zachariah" Dennis Hopper's "The Last Movie" and Andy Warhol's "Lonesome Cowboys" into some kind of coherent, logical whole. There is also a chapter devoted to consideration of the spaghetti western and the Japanese samurai epics as outgrowth of and additions to the standard American form.



It is easy to dislike the unrelenting pastiche of westerns if you keep yourself unaware of this genre's true masterpieces. This book is the first major work in English devoted specifically to the Western movie and it is intelligent and lively rather than scholarly and formal. And if you don't buy it for the words, you can dig the pictures; that's what movies are all about, right?

The Artist Of Our Century

FRITZ LANG
By Lotte H. Eisner
Oxford University Press
416 pps. $25.00

By E. Patrick McQuaid

"To begin with I should say that I am a visual person...When I had money I went in my spare time to the cinema, because I was already very interested in films from a professional point of view. When I painted or sketched, my subjects were, so to speak, un-animated. We sat, for example, in front of a model and it did not move; but the cinema was really pictures in motion. There I already subconsciously felt that a new art — later I called it the art of our century — was about to born."

Thus begins Fritz Lang, himself, in the latest but surely not the last study of his lifework by close associate Lotte H. Eisner. As the chapters were finished Eisner sent them off to Lang to verify the facts and asked him to write his own biography, the first chapter of the volume. Lang did not survive the first printing in England last year of this volume, however.

Film, Lang tells us, was not only an art but the sole purpose of his life and yet he has insisted that his private life had nothing to do with his film. "If my films," he told Eisner, "do not add up to an image of myself, then I do not deserve the book you are writing about me." Lang's autobiography is very sketchy, trailing off about the time when National Socialism forced him to flee Germany and ending abruptly with his decision to leave France and accept a contract with Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer in Hollywood. There is much to be learned about the complex personality of Lang from some of his other writings, especially his revealing article "Happily Ever After," from which the author quotes extensively in the concluding chapter. Here we see in his own words, Lang the philosopher, artist, and social critic.

There is not so much new light as there is old and perhaps overlooked or forgotten material in this book. Eisner has commented on each script and film that Lang was involved with often drawing passages from the screenplays and within the wide margins on each page are inserted quotes from film criticisms published at the time of the production. From Der Film and Kinematograph of the early 20's to The Village Voice in the 60's we see how Lang's work has been often misinterpreted but in most cases appreciated. It is interesting to note that in the chapter on his 1931 film M a segment from the final scene that places the blame for the child murders on the unequal distribution of wealth in society is missing from copies available today.

Lang's first professional debut in the cinema left him shocked. Joe May, a very well known director-producer from Berlin claimed the credits for Lang's script of Wedding in the Eccentric Club in 1918. He did not care for the direction of May's rendition and decided then, during its screening, that he would become a film director.

Lang is also known for his elaborate set designs. With Otto Hunte he designed the scenery of Die Nibelungen (1923-1924) to epic proportions. An entire forest was constructed inside because nature could not meet with the demands of Fritz Lang. The symbolic imagery employed throughout the film made it a classic of the German silent era and Lang refused to remake the two films Siegfrieds Tod and Kriemhilds Rache with the invention of sound.

Eisner's volume is the most definitive study of Lang to date though she doesn't claim the honour. When you make a film, insisted Lang, you give up your private life. Lotte Eisner's book has brought Fritz Lang, his life and his work back to us.

God and Sam Goldwyn

GOLDWYN
By Arthur Marx
Ballantine - New York
494 pps $1.95 paper

By David Schafer

Goldwyn, by Arthur Marx can best be summed up in the immortal words of Dorothy Parker: "This is not a book to be tossed aside lightly, it should be thrown with great force." Marx's writing style has two main faults, he obviously has no respect for Sam Goldwyn, and seems to have a flair for melodrama not seen since the latest Harlequin romance. These factors together make Goldwyn neither an unbiased biography nor an entertaining one. Marx has a fairy-tale way of stating things that turns the horror of Goldwyn's starving as a young runaway in Europe to a jolly tour through London on the ash-can meal plan. America is made to loom before Goldwyn's eyes as a land where even the poor can make a million, of course, this is a rags-to-riches story. America can turn a man with vision into a man with double vision.

As Sam matures, Marx switches his writing style from fairy tale to soap opera. The events and characters become so caught up in emotion they begin to sound like Vivien Leigh shouting "As God is my witness....!" in quadraphonic. For instance, Sam needs an emergency operation, "And then the attendants put Sam's motionless body on a cart and wheeled him out of the room and down the corridor. As Frances, alone, watched Sam go with an aching heart." Let us hope Sam goes with more than just an aching heart.

In a more "Inspirational" vein Marx tells of Frances's (Mrs. Goldwyn) decision to buy "Dead End" even though Sam may have been dying on the operating table at the same moment. "Frances's mind was suddenly filled with a vision of Sam's lifeless face as he was wheeled away from her on the cart. It didn't seem possible that he'd ever produce another picture again. Still, he wanted that property desperately. Suddenly Frances's face was filled with determination. "Pay the money, Mulvey, (one of Goldwyn's lawyers) Sam's going to get well and make the picture. And it'll be good. I've got that faith in God and Sam Goldwyn!"." While Frances filled her mind and face, Goldwyn did get well and make the picture and "Dead End" was a success. (He had to get well, it would have ruined her speech if he had died.)

The "quaint" writing style is not the only bad part about Goldwyn. Throughout the book Marx is constantly insulting Goldwyn and does not miss a chance to make him seem foolish. Even when complimenting Goldwyn, Marx does it in a backhanded way that is more of a dig than a commendation. For example, "Sam may not have had a college graduate's reading speed, Sam may not have had a large vocabulary, Sam may not have had an even temper, but he seemed to have had a visceral feeling about what the public wanted." Marx seems to have his goals mixed up, the first sentence in the book states "Sam Goldwyn never liked anything that ever appeared in print about himself claiming that he was always being depicted as an ignoramus...". This statement makes the reader think that Marx will try to be different. It is unbelievable, therefore, that Marx devotes the rest of this chapter to "Goldwynisms"

CAST OF THOUSANDS
By Anita Loos
Grosset and Dunlap
$15.95 until 1-1-78
$19.95 thereafter

By Debbie Schafer

Most people will recognize Anita Loos as the author of the film classic "Gentlemen Prefer Blondes" as well as numerous other books and screenplays. She has been a part of Hollywood since its very beginnings, starting her career as a child actress; but she found that she enjoyed writing more than acting so in 1912 she wrote "The New York Hat" for D.W. Griffith. It was the first of more than 100 screenplays written for Griffith, and the start of a brilliant association with the film industry and its personalities. Loos recounts many of adventures and acquaintances she has encountered during those years and this latest autobiography of hers literally stars A Cast of Thousands.

A Cast of Thousands might be more aptly termed "The Anita Loos Scrapbook" for as well as containing autobiographical material the book says much about Loos' contemporaries from Jean Harlowe to Mussolini (whom she met while in Italy before the war). It is lavishly illustrated with photos from her personal collection, and provides a witty, entertaining glimpse at the "living legends" who were, to Anita Loos, close personal friends. It is a book that would fit nicely on anyone's coffee table, and I can think of very few people who would not appreciate receiving Cast of Thousands as a gift.

Also including a "cast of thousands" is Bosley Crowther's Vintage Films, a collection of essays about "50 enduring motion pictures". Bosley, motion picture critic for the New York Times for 27 years who retired in 1968, has written about one film for each year from 1929 to 1972 in this illustrated volume.

But you'll be disappointed with Vintage Films if you're looking for a list of Hollywood's top fifty best sellers. Bosley doesn't sell out to Hollywood pulp, and the book includes such choice selections as Truffaut's The 400 Blows, and the more obscure Lonliness of the Long Distance Runner. Hollywood fans, though, will be pleased to see Singin' in the Rain and Meet Me in St. Louis. It is a book to interest both the casual film viewer and the serious student of the cinema.

Both Cast of Thousands and Vintage Films are available through the University Store.

RECORDS

PASSPORT
(Iguacu)
(Atco)

Klaus Doldinger, the leader and sax player of Passport, is a jazz-rock wizard. Despite the amazing music that this band makes, they have amassed only a small cult following here in the U.S.A. With incredible albums like Looking Thru, Cross Collateral, and Infinity Machine behind him, Klaus has once again turned out a masterpiece. The sound is fresh and different but still distinctively Passport.

Iguacu was recorded in Rio de Janeiro, and many of the tunes as well as almost all their titles show a great Brazillian influence. Seven Brazillian musicians help out on many of the cuts. Guitar is used as a major force for the first time on a Passport studio album, as Roy Louis plays with great feeling. Keyboard player Kristian Schultz sticks to electric piano, acoustic piano, and organ, thus forging a more straight ahead sound. Doldinger's sax explores its full melodic potential as usual.

"Bahia Do Sol" and "Aguamarinha" are the highlites of side one, while "Iguacu", "Heavyweight" and "Guna Guna" are the outstanding cuts on side two. If you enjoy instrumental, highly exciting music, you should familiarize yourself with this band. If you know Passport's music, don't be discouraged by the different cover, (no longer designed by Wandrey's) or the Brazillian titles, because Iguacu is as fine an effort as any previous Passport disc. GENTLE GIANT
Playing The Fool
(Capitol)

This was the album that should have followed The Power and The Glory, only to shunted aside in favor of the brilliant Free Hand lp. Unfortunately, Gentle Giant kept on putting it off, which saw the release of their worst record ever, Interview. But finally it's out — Playing The Fool is a Gentle Giant fan's dream.

Playing The Fool is an extremely well-balanced album, with at least one cut from all their records. More importantly, we can see why Giant is regarded so highly in progressive rock circles. Between the five Giants, they can play twenty-seven different instruments. Their compositions are rather amazing, running the gamut of classical, jazz, folk and rock. The most difficult time changes are within easy grasp. Plus they do it with an extremely fine-tuned sense of humor.

Among the best is the powerful "Excerpts From Octopus" and "Free Hand" — for sheer guts and deadly musicianship. And if that isn't enough, the vocal ffugues during "On Reflection" are unsurpassable. Considering Giant has been in a general decline of late (new material previewed in New York last month is reputed to be just as bad as Interview), Playing The Fool is a lasting monument of Gentle Giant's power and glory.

Pacino

falls of a total "clean cop" image.

Following his widely-acclaimed performances in "Godfather", Pacino's next film, "Scarecrow", with Gene Hackman, was received with a considerable amount of controversy by reviewers and critics, in spite of its grand prize award at the 1973 Cannes Film Festival. Many deemed Pacino as having become too closely associated with the theatrical mechanisms employed by Dustin Hoffman in "Midnight Cowboy." Admittedly, Pacino's "Richard III" and "Arturo Ui" performances seemed to reek of New York back-alleyism supported by gestures reminiscent of street corners and veritable waves of saliva, but he was not necessarily just a "macho-male" or N.Y. bum.

Undoubtedly aware of the need for a uniquely demanding role, Pacino's choice of "Dog Day Afternoon" for his next film was evidence of his determination to investigate his capabilities as an actor. It was in "Dog Day Afternoon" that Pacino proved his flexibility and genius as a creator by tapping the sources of an appearingly weak character and vitalizing its inherent strength. Pacino's metamorphosis from intense super-male into a vulnerable, homosexual bank robber was so complete that it was difficult to imagine the same masculinity one had sensed from his Michael Corleone. So much for the fascination held by an entourage of demi-god worshipping fans for the totally male image — Pacino was an actor.

It remains to be seen whether Pacino is still an actor or whether he has allowed himself to become another price-tagged product of Hollywood and the toothpastey-clean Redfords we know so well. "Bobby Deerfiled", a soon-to-be-released film, should be an interesting follow-up to Pacino's last role. Pacino stars as a Formula I racer who discovers love via a dying girl and presumably learns that life is more than just a lap (or a macho image).

little sayings by Goldwyn that have become famous, for instance, "Our comedies are not to be laughed at." Following chapter after chapter of Sam's incompetencies (including a nine page salute to Sam's cheating at every kind of game imaginable) Marx tells the reader that "He must have been a genius because he made such good pictures." Of course, to "balance" such a statement, Marx has a whole chapter on the people Goldwyn failed to make into stars even after spending millions of his own money. In the guise of offering opposing views, Marx destroys the "Goldwyn Touch" he is supposedly saluting.

Is there anything right with Goldwyn? Yes. At times, Marx does give us an amusing anecdote or two, and the chapter on Goldwyn's first epic "The Squaw Man" is fascinating. Unfortunately, these small moments are not enough to keep the book from failing in its ultimate purpose of bringing an unprejudiced, interesting biography. As Sam Goldwyn may have said of Arthur Marx's biography about him, "Include me out!"

THEATRE

VOLUNTEERS written by Brian Friel Directed by Liam O'Brien at City Studio Theatre

By Ann Grant and Chris Stanley

Americans as a people have always been the outsiders, the audience to the centuries-old conflict between the Irish Republican Army and the occupying forces of English Imperialism. But now, this conflict has been brought home by the cast of Volunteers by Brian Friel, in the play's American premiere.

According to IRA tenets, "you only volunteer once." But the handful of internees from Port Laoise Prison, Provisional IRA volunteers, have volunteered twice, and for this, they have to die.

The action takes place on a Friday morning in September, on the site of an archeological dig in the city of Wexford, Republic of Ireland. A luxurious hotel is slated for construction at this site, and George, the foreman of the dig, is reluctant to tell his diggers, all internees at Port Laoise Prison, that this is their last day.

But what George will never know is that each digger is a dead man, slated to die "accidentally" in a simulated prison riot, at the hands of their fellow imprisoned IRA members. For volunteering for George's project, they have violated a trust with the other inmates, for which the penalty is death.

The characters make the emotions, the frustrations and their attempts to deal with them, real.

Because of this, it is easy to lose sight of the fact that this is a play,

Keeney (Jeff Wilson), a former IRA battalion commander, tries to deal with his feelings by taking on the role of the cut-up. As the others settle down to work, he and Pyne (Mark Cuddy), a former company commander, play top banana and stooge, viciously ribbing the other diggers and parodying a well-built school teacher on tour of the dig with her young charges.

Wilson and Cuddy personify the trapped men, whose only means of putting their emotions into perspective is to put them in the background. Their characters grow throughout the play, until each has reached purgation.

Butt (Robert R. Lehan), a former section leader, seems to have the world in perspective. At the site, he digs, having a genuine interest in archaeology. He also goes through catharsis, but not as obviously as Keeney and Pyne. As quitting time draws near, all too aware that with it will come death, Butt, who was the only digger with a real respect for the science, destroys the only tangible product of their labors, a Viking jug.

This action startles George (Lester Miller), who damns Butt to Hell, unaware that his condemnation will be soon realized.

Knox (Edward C. McAdams), a former intelligence volunteer, is a benign character and the brunt of most of Keeney's humor. Knox's catharsis is seen only as he exits, waving an obscene gesture at George, the representative of "the screws".

Smiler (Gary S. Berner) is a cataleptic who reportedly got that way from a series of beatings he received from the screws. But inside the cataleptic is a whole human being, with all the feelings on the inside, rather than outside. While Smiler's mind still dictates thoughts, his body can't always respond.

Berner plays Smiler with such pathos-inspiring ability that when his catharsis comes, when he finds the shards of the jug which he originally found, and Butt has rebroken, and crushes one in his fist, emotional victory is his.

As stated before, it is easy to lose sight of the fact that this is a play. With the videotape presentation before it begins and with the actual construction site paraphernalia that form the set, the acting instills sympathy in the audience.

But the most important effect of seeing this play is feeling the frustration that the characters feel and seeing the different ways in which they deal with it. It is impossible to leave the City Studio Theatre unaffected by this production.

Performances will be April 21 - 24 and April 28 - May 1. Call City Studio Theatre at 584-3978 for ticket information.

Sherlock Holmes-Live(again)

By E. Patrick McQuaid and Dr. John Watson

We were sitting quietly in our flat at 221B Baker St. one fairly mild April night. I was busy pasting newspaper clips from our latest adventure into the scrapbook. Holmes was exceptionally quiet sitting near the fire sucking on his Calabesh. He suddenly rose and pointed the stem of his pipe in my direction.

"Watson," he began, "I sense something evil...incredibly evil in the air...-some...thing...someone..."

"Perhaps that '50's entertainer at the Bluewall last night, dear chap. I say, he was a bad element," I suggested.

"No, no, Watson," Holmes replied. "I'm talking about someone so unscrupulously evil, vile, coniving, demonic..."

"Holmes! You don't think...no! No! I saw him hang years ago in Cairo! He's dead, Holmes!"

"I'm afraid not, Watson...just look at this!" He thrust a theatre program in front of me. I studied it for several hours. Sometime near the break of dawn I confessed that I was completely baffled.

"Don't you see, old chap? That program, that play... it's called Sherlock Holmes...Watson, that's my name! Sherlock Holmes!"

"By Jove, you're right Holmes!"

"He's back, Watson...Professor Moriarty has returned to plague me once again...but for the last time!"

Holmes crowned his head with his famous deerstalker then sat back comfortably in his smoking chair. "Next week...next Thursday night at the UMass Fine Arts Center...we'll buy the tickets tomorrow, Watson. The box office is opened from 9 to 4 and the tickets range from $3 to $7. Quite affordable, I dare say! What with student prices and you on a senior citizen's ticket...it should be quite an evening...so, Professor Moriarty, we meet again!"

EBERHARD WEBER
The Following Morning
(ECM)

Eberhard Weber, a European bassist, has previously made several ECM recordings (including a collaboration with Gary Burton), which have been well received in some musical circles and have, at least, aroused interest in others.

This record contains four Weber compositions totaling over forty minutes and features Rainer Brüninghaus on piano, Weber on bass and celli, french horns, and oboe members of the Oslo Philharmonic Orchestra. Like many other ECM recordings, this music is not rooted in American jazz idioms and should therefore simply be called new music. In fact, Weber's music has those brooding qualities so associated with Scandinavian music.

The four pieces and their performances are outstanding; each portraying a brooding, wishful, reflective consciousness, facing life in pain. This is stark, highly emotional music which is capable with its use of musical space of immersing the listener in a musical experience that stirs up memories and emotions in a continuous way not possible with most music. While this music, with its different idiom, requires a little getting used to, it is well worth the effort. Those who follow the use of electric bass in jazz will after listening to how Weber uses it, put him right up there with Stanley Clarke. All in all, a record well worth aquiring. (A)

ROY HARPER
One of Those Days In England
(Chrysalis)

It was in an interview with Jethro Tull that I first became aware of Roy Harper; Ian Anderson had just requested a DJ to play some Roy Harper because "he wipes the floor with all your James Taylors". Hmmmmm...quite right Ian. But it's not just Ian Anderson who idolizes Mr. Harper; Paul McCartney, Pink Floyd and Led Zeppelin do, too — Jimmy Page and Dave Gilmour are regulars concerning studio work with Harper, let alone writing about him and having him guest on their own albums.

Despite all the brew-ha-ha from the stars, Harper remains obscure. One Of Those Days In England (Bullinamingvase) is his tenth album and of the few I've heard, his best. This is very English music. Like Richard Thompson and John Martyn, Harper is an uncompromising artist. To most Americans, he will sound incredibly pretentious. His music suffers at times at the expense of his lyrics, which to say the least, are misleading and obscure. However, put some time into it and you'll find a very compelling artist.

Bullinamingvase picks off where his "second" American debut lp, When The Old Cricketer Leaves The Crease, left off. It is as dense as Cricketer, but surprisingly commercial. The title track is a twenty-five minute affair tracing English history, more or less. The music and melodies are intricate, almost serpentine in the way they glide silently in and out.

The short cuts are not about to be outdone either, of which "Naked Flame", "These Last Days" and "Cherishing The Lonesome" are the best. Like the title track from Cricketer, "These Last Days" and "Cherishing The Lonesome" are prophetic glimpses at growing old and being alone. "Cherishing The Lonesome" is particularly exquisite; a self-examination of his life at the moment, lovingly draped in acoustic, rhythmic guitar layers. "Naked Flame" betrays his tormented self-image shattering his resentment with romanticism.

Harper's current band is surprisingly adept at delivering the goods, though not as good as the Gilmour-Spedding-Bruford combo of Cricketor. Bullinamingvase, however, never fails to disappoint. A very difficult album, yet destined to be in the end a highly rewarding one.

Beck's Bad Boy

JEFF BECK WITH THE Jan Hammer Group
Live
(Epic)

Bad boy, living legend Jeff Beck has found himself quite a niche since changing to fusion music. The success of Blow By Blow and Wired are proof of the pudding. But while Jeff has made a lot of people happy (most likely because he's still alive), he's left an equal amount of us wondering aloud about the new "Beckavishnu."

For those with the question marks, Live is cause for hope. It is not likely that Beck will go back to rock & roll, but at least in concert he makes an attempt to show us just what a great guitarist he is. Live is a document of Jeff's summer tour with his new buddies, The Jan Hammer Group, who were used off and on for Wired. Although Beck gets top billing, the record is half and half. All of Beck's stuff is quite good, while Hammer's trips over itself for the most part.

Side Two ko's the first as far as murderous swipes from Beck go, especially "Scatterbrain" and "Blue Wind." On both tunes Beck goes crazy with swipes that are almost as good as his Yardbird days. And, ever the tease, the old geezer suddenly stops some mid-air riffing in "Blue Wind" to pull out "Train Kept A Rolling" — as if to remind certain other bands of the right way to do it. If only he'd record another Truth....

Aliens on Atlantic

FOREIGNER
(Atlantic)

Ever wonder what happened to Ian McDonald of the original King Crimson? After floating around for a few years he has formed Foreigner along with several other notable persons. On lead guitar is Mick Jones, formerly with Spooky Tooth, who is the major songwriter on the album. Al Greenwood (keyboards) was a member of Storm, the re-formed U.S. version of Flash. Dennis Elliot, (drums) played on Ian Hunter's solo album. Lou Gramm was the vocalist of Black Sheep, (who were avid Spooky Tooth followers,) and recorded 2 LP's, and whose vocal quality is similar to Robbie Steinhart of Kansas. On bass is Ed Gagliardi of obscure but talented origin. The band's first album shows a diversity of style that one would expect from such a collection of musicians. One thing that keeps it alive is the variation instrumentation and texture. McDonald contributes the most to this by playing a wide variety of instruments including keyboards, guitars, brass, woodwinds and vocals. The album is not outstanding or innovative, but is well constructed and very listenable. The lyrics are typical in theme and lack notable poetical quality. "Feels like the first time" and "Cold as Ice," the songs most likely to be released as singles, are good solid R&R. "Starrider" and "At War with the World" lean towards a progressive style reminiscent of King Crimson without the spaciness, and of Kansas without their Wagnerian heaviness. This is a good first album for Foreigner and definitely worth listening to. As the band progresses together as a whole, their next album should prove to be more innovative and capable of establishing them as a strong and creative band.

PROCOL HARUM
Something Magic (Warner Brothers)

Having left Chrysalis for Warner Brothers, Procol Harum continue their tradition of fusing R&B with Classical on Something Magic, their tenth album. Fortunately, this effort is far superior to its predecessor, 1975's abysmal Procol's Ninth. It becomes the first Procol album to be totally recorded in the U.S. (at Miami's Criteria Studios.) Bassist Alan Cartwright has departed, and, never content to do simply what could be done complicatedly, the group has transported ex-organist Chris Copping over to bass and brought in Peter Solley to man the organ and synthesiser.

Something Magic opens with the title track, dealing with man's innate fears of the nighttime. It is followed by a waltz-like tune, "Skating On Thin Ice," whose soothing melody enables it to be one of this side's most pleasing numbers. Next up is a semi-rocker entitled "Wizard Man," for which music was written by guitarist Mick Grabham (usually this is pianist Gary Brooker's role; to supplement Keith Reid's lyrics.) "Mark Of The Claw" concerns Reid's treatment of the semi-irrational tides of fate. Side One concludes with "Strangers In Space," the elpee's big loser. Better that it be lost in space; it's unable to produce enough energy to strike a spark, as it goes nowhere.

Side two is taken up in its entirety by Brooker's lushly orchestrated opus "The Worm And The Tree." It takes the form of an allegory detailing how the forces of good must eventually triumph over those of evil. Brooker doesn't ever sing here, instead he recites the seven verses in a manner which brings to mind Rick Wakeman's Journey To The Centre Of The Earth as well as the mystical poetry of the Moody Blues. The tale is a wee bit hokey at times, but it comes off rather well for the most part. The heavy orchestration is more of a plus than a minus, something which has not always been the case with Procol's past creations.

Summing up, this album is well constructed and well produced. Its positive aspects far outweigh its negative. Therefore, I bestow upon it a "Something Magic is better than no magic at all" B.

NILS LOFGREN
I Came To Dance
(A&M)

His record company has buttons proclaiming "Nils Is Next", so you know he might be in big trouble. Maybe. While Lofgren isn't as faceless as Peter Frampton is (or turned out to be), the posture of I Came To Dance suggests an unfortunate re-evaluation of direction. Don't get me wrong, this new album is good but it certainly lacks the bravado of Cry Tough.

The major failing of I Came To Dance lies with the production, which ironically is by Nils and his drummer Andy Newmark. The raucous guitar of "Moontears" and "Back It Up" or the dreamy ballads have been glossed over — the most noticeable fact about I Came To Dance is the absence of any distinctive rock 'n' roll number. Everything kinda glides in a too smooth, too calculated way.

If Nils Lofgren wasn't such a talent, Dance might have been a disaster. There's only one qualified clunker here, "Rock Me At Home". The highlight is "Jealous Gun", where Lofgren's guitar, the production and the chorus go crackers. "Happy Ending Kids" and "Code Of The Road" do it also.

While I Came To Dance is not what we hoped for, it never slacks too much. However, a few more dips like this and Nils' is treading on dangerous ground. A solution might be to have A&M release the legendary Back It Up lp. If Nils is next, he'll do it on his own.

THE ROSSLYN MOUNTAIN BOYS
(Adelphi Records, Silver Spring, Md.)

Yesterday, if you had asked me about the Rosslyn Mountain Boys, I would have said, "Huh? Who are they?" TODAY, I say they are the best new country rock band I've heard in over a year. Doubt me if you wish, but these boys are damn good.

They play country music in the vein of Pure Prairie League, with touches of Gram Parsons (and others) in the arrangements. But to my ears they beat 'em at their own game. "Gerry's Velvet Hardhat" is an easy and sensitive ballad that is very engaging. "Right Before My Eyes" rocks gently, but steadily, pushed by the excellent steel guitar of Tommy Hannum. "Faithful Lover" is the vocal showpiece, set in a hymnal framework. "My Friend The Glass" is one of those last call closing-time rockers that shakes the whiskey from your glass and sends you home.

This music, mostly originals, is strong and stands up very well after repeated loud playings. The vocals are weak in spots, and the production could improve, but the musicianship is steady and the group is talented enough to cover all of the country bases. All the ingredients are here, alright, but time will tell. Just remember where you heard the curse first.

Ratings
++++ Superb +++ Superior ++ Satisfactory + Suck
0 TV Filler

++++ All the Presidents Men — One of the most fascinating movies I've seen in a long time. The Bob Woodward and Carl Bernstein book has been turned into a low-key thriller by screenwriter William Goldman and director Alan Pakula. Performances in the Watergate film are first rate. Robert Redford (he should have been nominated for an Oscar) and Dustin Hoffman are excellent. It is a story that is too unreal to be true — yet it is.

+++ Bananas — Woody Allen's Latin American revolution blasts non-stop laughter in possibly his finest film. Co-starring Louise Lasser.

++++ Black Sunday — One of the best thrillers of 1977. A comeback for director John Frankenheimer (Grand Prix, The Manchurian Candidate) after some lean years. A group of Palestinian terrorists bent on paying back the United States for non-support of their cause, try to stage the ultimate massacre — the killing of 80,000 people at the Super Bowl. It is a taut, slick movie that brims with excitement, yet it is deep in characterization. Violence in the film is quite disturbing though. Good performances by Robert Shaw and Marthe Keller, an outstanding work by Bruce Dern.

+++ Carrie — A somewhat silly horror movie that is pulled off because of Sissy Spacek's bravura performance. A young girl with the strange power of telekinesis (ability to move objects by the mental process) is the ugly duckling of her high school. On senior prom night, she becomes queen, but not before some jealous girls play one of the cruelest practical jokes in history. Carrie, then uses her strange powers to wreck havoc on her tormenters. Good acting from just about everyone, and the usual strange, but satisfying direction from Brian De Palma.

++++ The Conversation — Francis Ford Coppla (Godfather I and II) directs Gene Hackman in a compelling psychological tale of privacy. Do not let the plot fool you, this is class film making by the industry's finest.

++ The Eagle Has Landed — An interesting story that could have been developed better. The story involves a Nazi attempt to capture Winston Churchill, but since you know that Churchill made it through WWII, there is little suspense. Donald Sutherland turns in a fine performance.

++ The Enforcer — Clint Eastwood as Dirty Harry for the third time. This time, Harry is after a group of revolutionaries who have kidnapped the mayor of San Francisco. The film is much better than its predecessor, Magnum Force, but it tends to become preposterous and slow in many places. The original, Dirty Harry, was directed by veteran action film maker Don Siegel and was the most cohesive of the three. Eastwood, as usual, turns in his patented performance of one liners and killing the bad guys. A nice surprise was the performance of Tyne Daly as Harry's female partner. A directing first for James Fargo who worked as an assistant on previous Eastwood movies.

++ Fun With Dick and Jane — Suburbanites George Segal and Jane Fonda romp through crime in Doris Day and Rock Hudson fashion in a film that never really gets going. Aimed at the older crowd.

++Harry and Tonto — An old man (Art Carney) and his cat (Tonto) take off on a cross country journey. Paul Mazursky's film is a funny and touching look at the perils of old age. The film has a tendency to move too slowly at times though. Co-starring Ellen Burstyn and rated R because of one dumb swear word. Best Actor Oscar for Carney. Coming to Hampshire College.

+++ King Kong — The remake of the 1933 Merrin Cooper classic is lot better than expected. The process photography is terrible, but the ape looks good and the acting isn't bad. The script is campy, but it is probably the only way it could have been written. The story is updated so that the trip to Skull Island is a search for a new supply of oil. The expedition is disappointed in their quest, but instead they come across the Madison Avenue ad man's dream — a gigantic ape that can be used in the oil company's advertising. Good performances by Jeff Bridges, Charles Grodin and an excellent debut by Jessica Lange. Directed by John Guillermin (The Towering Inferno, The Blue Max).

+++ Le Samourai — (1967) Jean Melville admired the gangster period of the American cinema, and attempted to emulate this style in a French gangster movie about a lone assassin and his final target, complete with all the twists. Starring Alain Delon.

++++ Mr. Carter goes to Washington — Another in the continuing sequels of American films that highlight the democratic process. In this one Mr. Carter (played by William Shatner) does a Horatio Algier, going from Peanut farmer to President. Fine performance by Sissy Spacek as Amy Carter.

+++ Network — Hollywood's finest artists lash out at the industry's tormenter — the tube, in this terrific satire. Directed by Sidney Lumet (Serpico, Dog Day Afternoon), and written by Paddy Chaefsky (The Hospital, Marty), Network is the story of a third rate broadcasting company called UBS and its attempts to improve its ratings. An interesting look at corporate powers and their influence on television, and the way in which T.V. has affected this generation of Americans. Eloquent dialogue by Chaefsky, but at times it becomes boring and unrealistic. With Faye Dunaway (Best Actress Oscar), Peter Finch (Best Actor), William Holden, and Robert Duvall. An Oscar for Chaefsky also.

++++ Orpheas — (1952) French film surrealist director Jean Cocteau created a work of total beauty and feeling. Based of the Greek myth, this is his finest effort, but one which is rarely seen. You'll walk out in another world.

++++ The Producers — Gene Wilder and Zero Mostel team in Mel Brook's trip through the Broadway production of 'Springtime for Hitler' Comedy at its best.

++++ The Rules Of The Game — (1939) To those still unfamiliar with Jean Renoir, too bad. 'Rules' is on every list of the top five motion pictures ever made. More than a movie.

+++ Taxi Driver — Robert DeNiro gives one of the most haunting performances in movie history and Martin Scorcese provides visual refreshment in this tale of a coroded environment. Brilliant, but violent.

Bromery, Puryear defend plan

By MARY ELLEN LOWNEY
Collegian Staff

Chancellor Randolph W. Bromery and Provost Paul L. Puryear defended the five-year reallocation plan before Faculty Senate yesterday, urging senators to respond with opinions and suggestions.

"We are prepared to deal with the process in any way you decide," said Puryear, in reference to the implementation of the second stage of the plan.

At a special meeting last Friday, the Faculty Senate voted their disapproval of Puryear's plan, saying it was "not in accordance with governance regulations." According to these regulations, the senate must be included in any decisions relating to academics.

Puryear pointed out yesterday that the University is undergoing changes, referring to the recently elected faculty union. But, he added, "The campus administration will continue to be guided by the governance document."

A "small committee of deans" will evaluate academic administrators and form a new position in the administration to define and implement relations between the Faculty Senate and the administration, Puryear said.

Question and answer period, normally limited to ten minutes, lasted about two hours. 32 questions, most of them dealing with how the five-year plan will affect tenure, were raised.

"Tenure will be dealt with in the light of the existing plan," said Puryear, "but the administration has not yet made any final decisions."

When asked whether presently tenured faculty would be affected by the plan, he said, "The plan will proceed with no jeopardy to existing faculty."

Many senators, though, were of the opinion that reallocation is unfair to existing programs such as Liberal Arts and Humanities. Asian Studies, which, according to the plan will be phased out over the next five years, "is vitally important to an institution such as this University," said one senator.

Puryear was sympathetic but unflinching.

"There are about 600 students who cannot be admitted to high-demand programs because of a lack of faculty and facilities," he said.

The reallocation plan was designed "to accommodate new areas of high student demand," according to Puryear. He said some changes had been made to the second stages, but when pressed to specify, said they were "not major." He called the changes a refinement "as a result of feedback from departments and schools." The second stage of the Long Range Plan will be made available for Faculty Senate review and comment on July 1, 1977.

Some interesting suggestions were proposed to Puryear, such as cutting back on the administration's budget, making academic administrators teach a course each semester, or reallocating teachers from low student demand programs to teach in high student demand programs. All of these ideas were rejected.

After lengthy discussion and much disagreement, Puryear remained firm in his original position that student demand, not tenure, level funding or the academic importance of certain programs, is the most important factor in the decision to reallocate University funds.

The meeting was adjourned with a proposal for a special meeting next Thursday to continue with items on yesterday's agenda.

UMass Civil Engineering professor Williams Heronemus spoke on alternate energy systems last night as part of the Chancellor's Lecture Series. (Staff photo by Chris Bourne)

Solar energy needed soon says Engineering prof

By MICHAEL SIMONS
Collegian Staff

"It can be done and it will be done, we're not going to sit around .... we need solar energy employment construction and more research and development, especially here at UMass," Professor William Heronemus said last night in the Campus Center Auditorium in a speech entitled, "Toward a national solar energy policy."

Heronemus was the third and final speaker in the Chancellors Lecture Series of this year.

Professor of Civil Engineering at UMass since 1967, Heronemus may be the foremost expert on wind systems in the country. His experimental wind and solar energy home, Solar Habitat One, is now located behind Orchard Hill. The house is the first time wind and solar energy systems have been used in combination.

Heronemus began his lecture after a brief introduction by Chancellor Randolph W. Bromery, explaining how America, up to the present Carter administration, had been led energy-wise by what he called "the plan."

The plan, he said was nothing more than a rehash of the 20-year-old atomic energy commission, but was used extensively by the Nixon and Ford administrations. Coal and an increasing dependence on imported fuel with the controversial breeder reactor.

" 'The plan', was 99 per cent hokum. The first commercial breeder in this country was a complete loss. What Carter has done was embrace a substitute, the Conservation substitute," Heronemus said.

Hopefully now, Heronemus said, we will look out for the nation and not for industry because no one can be opposed to the conservation concept.

Heronemus promised the Conservation program will show results very soon and will eliminate many of the conflicts that combustion of fission fuels now have, including pollution, weather modification, the economic burden of storing nuclear waste for 10,000 generations and the low amount of employment per dollar spent.

"Our leaders don't believe solar energy will work and there is total refusal on the part of some individuals that solar energy will have any possibility of being practical," he said.

Heronemus said solar energy plays a big part in our lives now, from keeping our bodies healthy to growing our food.

Heronemus spoke on the subject with which he is most famously associated, the windmill or wind furnace.

"The wind furnace is the most economical wind system ever to be conceived. It is a physical fact that wind energy could heat the United States alone. The United States, should go solar and wind itself just

Union, administration begin discussion

The recently-elected faculty union and the UMass administration yesterday announced talks have begun between the groups to clear the way for further discussion on the administration's refusal to recognize the union.

The Board of Trustees voted in March not to recognize the Massachusetts Society Professors, (MSP) and their Boston affiliate, elected in February to represent faculty and related staff, on the grounds the bargaining unit was "too complex".

In a press release issued jointly, the groups said they met Tuesday and "are hopeful that the issues which have separated the parties thus far can be resolved in the near future." A second meeting has been scheduled for April 22, according to the release.

The MSP represents Amherst campus faculty and is affiliated with the Boston campus' Faculty Staff Union. The two locals are jointly represented by the Massachusetts Teachers Association (MTA).

SWA elections spark turmoil

By LARRY COHEN
Collegian Staff

In an election marred by accusations, Diana Fessenden, Bruce Berkowitz, Bonnie Ward-Gregory Maynard, and Linda Venuti yesterday were elected president, vice-president, co-treasurers, and communication coordinator respectively of the Southwest Assembly.

Suspicions were aroused yesterday when the Southwest Newsletter misplaced Linda Venuti's name at the top of the first page, along with co-editors Joni Mersky and Mark Cavanaugh. Her name should have appeared with the candidates for the Southwest Executive Committee, which appeared at the bottom of the page.

President-elect Diana Fessenden, who ran unopposed, said the mistake was too coincidential with yesterday's election. "I don't think it happened accidentally," she said.

Vonuti, who won the job of communications coordinator with 641 votes, charged opponent Joni Mersky with breaking the election rules. Venuti said she saw Mersky sitting next to the ballot box during the election. The election rules and regulations state "No candidate shall actively campaign or cause campaigning to occur within sight of or within the proximity of a polling place."

Mersky did not comment.

Venuti also charged the slate of Fessendon, Berkowitz, Maynard-Ward, and Mersky with misusing Student Activities Tax Funds (SATF) by allowing a private advertisement to appear on a placecard they had printed. The placecards, which Venuti said were not allowed to be placed on the dining common tables, were passed out by Mersky in front of Berkshire dining commons.

Peter Clinch, a resident of Washington tower, said, "She (Joni) said to read this placecard and leave it on the table when we were finished."

Fessenden said she had called Worcester dining commons for permission to put the placecards on the tables. "Worcester said that their new policy was to allow only announcements and things like that to remain on the tables," she said. "They said they couldn't give us official permission, but we could put them on the tables. However, they would be cleared off the tables at the end of the night."

Fessenden admitted to allowing the advertisement to appear on the placecard. "It was our fault. When we realized our mistake, we had the rest of the placecards destroyed," she said.

Student Attorney General Paul Yanowitch said any complaints about the election would have to be directed to the Southwest Assembly first, to decide if a new election should take place.

"One of the losers could sue in a civil suit," said Yanowitch, "under the fact that the placecards were illegal, should not have been there, and caused substantial harm to his or her campaign."

The election brought out a 22 per cent voter turnout from Southwest. Diana Fessenden, who served this past year as vice-president, received 836 votes. Bruce Berkowitz, vice-president-elect, received 505 votes, edging out Don Bishop by 19 votes. Greg Maynard and Bonnie Ward, co-treasurers-elect, received 553 votes to beat Carol Shaw for that office.

Non-smoking areas designated...

By JEAN CONLEY
Collegian Staff

Strong support for no-smoking areas on campus prompted the Campus Center Board of Governors (BOG) last night to designate sections of the Campus Center Student Union complex as no-smoking areas.

The music room, across from the Bluewall, the elevated section of the Hatch, and the southside of the Coffee Shop are the areas affected by the decision.

Students representing the Coalition for Environmental Quality (CEQ) cited a Project PULSE survey in their summation to the board. The survey points out strong approval from students for restricted and no-smoking areas on campus.

Almost 50 per cent of the students polled said they would like to see smoking restricted to certain areas of eating establishments other than the dining commons. Another 24 per cent said smoking should not be allowed at all in these places.

In the dining commons, 55 per cent said they wanted smoking restricted to certain areas. Almost 28 per cent said smoking should not be permitted at all.

The greatest opposition to smoking came in the area of classrooms. 66 per cent said smoking should not be permitted at all.

No-smoking signs will also be placed in elevators. Paul Berger, ACEP representative said people are often reluctant to ask someone to put out a cigarette if they do not have the support of a sign in an obvious place. 78 of the respondents who smoke said they obey "no smoking" signs on campus, while 11 per cent do not, and 11 per cent sometimes do.

Berger said enforcement of the regulations would best be accomplished by "peer pressure," saying that "throwing people out of the building" is not a realistic solution. Similar no smoking regulations were tried in areas of the complex last year with very little success, according to assistant Campus Center Director Bud Wilkes.

In other business, the board approved closing the Hatch between the hours of three and seven p.m.

There was no clear indication from Wilkes as to whether or not student jobs that would be lost through the move will be secured for the rest of the semester.

Discussion pointed to the probability that students who work in the Hatch during the hours affected would be given other jobs within the Campus Center. There was no decision when the change in hours would take effect.

Jim Riley, acting Assistant Coordinator of Student Activities, gave a report to the board in which he suggested the Program Council, which programs events in the Campus Center, become an integral part of the board's function.

"The Board should be involved in events that happen in the building as well as its governance", said Riley. "Issues of the semester," he said, include not only musical, theatrical and artistic events, but also debates on issues pertinent to student interest.

...strike effect of 'second hand smoke'

By JEAN CONLEY
Collegian Staff

"Second hand smoke", the effects of smoking on nonsmokers, is an area in which students would like more information, according to a recent Project PULSE survey on smoking.

If the survey is any indication, 68 per cent of the students on the UMass campus do not smoke cigarettes, cigars or pipes, but according to a pamphlet issued by the American Lung Association, people not smoking in a smoke-filled room can be "as bad off" as those who are.

Every time anyone lights a cigarette, cigar or pipe, tobacco smoke enters the atmosphere from two sources. Most important for nonsmokers, there is "sidestream" smoke, which goes directly into the air from the burning end. Then there is mainstream smoke, which the smoker pulls through the mouthpiece when he or she inhales or puffs.

Nonsmokers are also exposed to mainstream smoke after the smoker exhales it.

sidestream smoke has a higher concentration of noxious compounds than the mainstream smoke inhaled by the smoker. Studies show there is twice as much tar and nicotine in sidestream smoke compared to mainstream, and three times as much of a compound call 3-4 benzpyrene, suspected of being a cancer-causing agent. Five times as much carbon monoxide is emitted by sidestream smoke.

In industry, the maximum concentration of carbon monoxide in the air cannot average to more than 50 parts per million. Industry limits "outside air" concentrations to an average of nine parts.

Researchers have found that smoking seven cigarettes in one hour create carbon monoxide levels of 20 parts. In the seat next to the smoker, the level shoots up to 90 parts, almost twice the maximum set for industry. Smoking ten cigarettes in an enclosed car also produced levels of up to 90 parts. When nonsmokers were exposed to these levels, the carbon monoxide level in their blood not only doubled within the first hour, but doubled again during the second.

The National Interagency Council on Smoking and Health has signed and adopted a Nonsmoker's Bill of Rights. These rights include

The Right to Breathe Clean Air, which states, "Nonsmokers have the right to breathe clean air, free from harmful and irritating tobacco smoke. This right supersedes the right to smoke when the two conflict," and

The Right to Speak Out which states "Nonsmokers have the right to express their discomfort and adverse reactions to smoke. Nonsmokers have the right to take action through legislative channels, social pressures and other legitimate means to prevent or discourage smokers and seek the restriction of smoking in public places."

Relative of victims held for Easthampton slayings

EASTHAMPTON (AP) — A Virginia man faced a bond hearing today in Virginia Beach, Va., in the gunshot slayings of his mother, sister and an elderly boarder at their home here.

Herman L. Harris, 49, of Virginia Beach, Va., was arrested yesterday at the Norfolk, Va., Naval Base on a fugitive from justice warrant, authorities said. His bond hearing was scheduled in Virginia Beach District Court.

In Northampton, Hampshire-Franklin Dist. Atty. John M. Callahan said Massachusetts authorities would move to have the 20-year Navy veteran returned if he did not waive extradition.

"There are no other suspects in this case at this time", Callahan said.

Bond was originally set at $750,000 when Harris was taken into custody without incident by an Easthampton police detective and a Virginia Beach officer.

The father of a 7-year-old girl, Harris was listed as a Navy fire controlman, ballistics, first class, who was to retire soon.

His mother, Velma P. Kulis, 69; his sister, Mozelle J. Evans, 47; and George Healey, 77, a boarder at the Kulis home, all were found dead March 21 with gunshot wounds in the head.

Deborah A. Evans, 19, Harris' niece and Evans' daughter, survived the attack. She was released Sunday from a hospital to continue recovering from surgery that removed a bullet from her head.

According to court documents in Virginia, Kulis filed a suit in February against Harris and his wife, alleging that they converted to their own use $30,000 of Kulis' money without her consent.

Police filed sworn affidavits in connection with a search warrant saying they confiscated a gun, bullet-making equipment, wire-cutting tools and other objects during a search earlier this month of Harris' home and motor vehicle.

They alleged that Harris drove to Massachusetts, broke into Kulis' house after cutting telephone wires outside and shot the victims with a handgun during the night of March 19-20.

Harris was charged in warrants issued at Northampton District Court with three counts of murder, assault with intent to commit murder, assault and battery with a dangerous weapon and armed breaking and entering in the nighttime with intent to commit a felony.

Evans, an art major at Holyoke Community College, apparently is alert and expected to recover fully from her wound.

Police believed she remained wounded in her bed for as long as 34 hours before the victims were found.

Police have refused to comment on the extent to which she has been able to describe the shootings. Callahan said police guard of Evans was being lifted.

Kerrins says charge for Index legal

By MICHAEL SIMONS
Collegian Staff

FOLLOW-UP

Student Senate Treasurer Thomas Kerrins confirmed yesterday statements he had previously made to the Collegian concerning the legality of last year's Index yearbook charge.

Kerrins said he had spoken with last year's Index editor, Daniel Smith and Henry Doyle, the previous senate treasurer who confirmed his claim that Whitmore was informed of changes in the Index card but for some reason failed to act upon them.

Students claiming their Index last December, in addition to turning in the Index card had to pay one dollar.

In the Collegian story of February 23rd, Stephen N. Mathieu, a junior accounting major claimed the charging of an additional dollar may have violated Massachusetts State Contract Law because the Index card was a legal document of title.

Kerrins said the year's (1977) Index cards will read the same as last years except for the additions of the words "plus a dollar".

Over 5,000 books were sold last year and Korrins thinks the dollar change was a good method of determining which students really want the book.

Hite urges student support

By ARNOLD WARSHAW

Speaking before the Northeast Area Government (NEAG) meeting last night, Student Government Association (SGA) co-president John Hite said that students' help is needed in fighting for a better UMass budget.

"We still have a lot of hard work to do," said Hite. "We need people to write letters to their state representatives (to tell the reps of their opposition to level funding)."

Hite also said many problems will have to be smoothed out before the SGA's budget is completed and approved.

In other NEAG business, it was announced that a liquor license had been obtained for Northeast Area Quad Day.

A representative from Hamlim dormitory said there will be a coffee house in there this Sunday from 8 p.m. to 12 a.m.

NEAG members voted against a proposal from Lewis dormitory that NEAG loan that dorm $25 dollars for the renting of a popcorn machine for Quad Day.

NEAG President Beth Tibbetts asked that all representatives have their student dorm senators contact her concerning the SGA's possible budget cuts for area governments.

Tibbets also said if any Northeast dorms wanted buses for transportation to any event, they should get in contact with NEAG Treasurer John Gross.

On the social scene, 230 tickets have been sold for the Northeast Semi-Formal Dinner Dance, according to Tibbetts. The dance will take place tonight at 8:00 p.m. in the Campus Center Auditorium.

Jagan talks on struggle

By ALEXANDRA CONANT
Collegian Staff

"There is an ever widening gap between the economic levels of Third World and developed nations. The root of this problem lies in the fact that the resources and industries of the Third World nations are held by the developed nations of the world. This problem can only be solved by Third World nations taking an anti-Imperialist stance," said Dr. Cheddi Jagan to an audience of 73 last night in Shattuck Auditorium, in the Public Health building.

"The Struggle for Economic Independence in Asia, Africa, Latin America, and the Carribean," was the topic of Jagan's speech. A former prime minister of Guyana and a founder of the People's Progressive Party in Guyana, Jagan is also the author of the widely acclaimed book "The West on Trial: The Fight For Guyana's Freedom."

GSEU devises set of demands

By M.A. Lewitt
Collegian Staff

The Graduate Student Employes Union (GSEU) last night devised its final set of demands for increased job security, no tuition hikes, union recognition and implementation of affirmative action.

They will present the demands to Chancellor Randolph W. Bromery, the administration, and Provost Paul L. Puryear today. At noon the group will meet in the Campus Center to discuss job action, including the possible withholding of grades.

GSEU is composed of graduate teaching assistants, teaching associates, and research assistants.

The group yesterday discussed three demands formulated at its stewards meeting last week as well as five additional ones approved last night.

The union, officially supported by 30 per cent of UMass graduate student employes, is asking there be no cuts in the number of state-funded graduate teaching assistant positions next year.

Steve Oravecz, a teaching assistant in the Rhetoric program, said it is rumored the administration plans to cut teaching assistant positions by six per cent; the burden falling heavily on the humanities and social sciences.

According to department reports, the comparative literature dept. could lose seven of its eight assistants next year. The philosophy dept. could lose eight of its 12 positions. Foreign languages could lose 75 per cent of its money for graduate assistants and the chemistry and physics depts. 10 per cent.

Teaching assistants from the English, rhetoric and comparative literature programs stressed last night the need to enlist the support of the assistants who "are assuming their departments are secure."

"The graduate program in general will be going down and all graduate employes will be affected," said one person at the meeting.

"Cuts in the future threaten those who don't feel the heat now,"

The second demand voted into the platform states that "Current holders of appointments receive first reappointment priority next year if they remain eligible according to department criteria."

The third demand states that there be no increase in the provost's guidelines of 20 hours per week for full-time assistantship. Responding to an Economics teaching assistant's question on the relevance of this demand, graduate employes in Rhetoric and the foreign languages said they were presently working well over 20 hours.

The fourth demand is that the administration recognize the GSEU. GSEU has filed for legal bargaining status with the State Labor Board but doesn't expect to hear from the board until next winter. The criteria on which the board grants legal status are employe status of graduate students and the signatureship of 30 per cent of the body the union seeks to represent, which GSEU has.

This means 30 per cent of the 1600 graduate student employes sign cards giving their official support to GSEU.

Chairperson Sherry Flashman calmly straightens out a little confusion at last night's Graduate Student Union employees meeting. (Staff photo by Steve Parrott)

Averages one per minute

A culture that nurtures rape

Editor's Note — This is the first of a 4-part weekly series on rape.

By LAURY ROBERTS
Collegian Staff

Saturday night I went to a bar which featured a male and female exotic dance act. Their sarfari number included a lot of mock hair pulling and general slapping around, ending with the male "savagely" tearing down the top of the woman's outfit. It glorified aggression. It exalted rape.

When I told a friend of mine I was working on an article about rape he said, "Oh you read about that stuff every semester. Try to say something different."

However, rape is like racism, one article or one workshop does not alleviate the problem. Education and awareness are ongoing processes. But, in researching my material I did keep my friend's advice in mind, and was surprised when I looked beyond the perimeters of the assumptions and myths about rape which our culture has nurtured.

Our culture perpetuates and tolerates rape. How else can rape be allowed to occur on an average of one per minute?

Pornography and prostitution may not be the immediate catalyst to rape, but it degrades women and makes them salable merchandise, thus maintaining inequality of the sexes. Confession magazines, purchased mostly by poor, young women (the group which statistically suffers the greatest number of rapes) often portray the rape victim as being somewhat responsible for the act and viewing it as a positive effect on her life.

As a journalist and a woman, it is evident to me that the news media rarely covers women's issues with much serious thought or sincerity. It is the white, middle class male who is in power and it is he who receives the column inches.

Television is a showcase for aggression. Men (particularly the "good guys") can take what they want by force, and that often includes their women (who are always gorgeous. Our culture has always equated aggression with masculinity and passivity with feminity.

Movies depict rape as the sensual violation of a beautiful woman such as "Straw Dogs", "A Clockwork

SW focuses on men in unique conference

By ELIZABETH S. KENT
Collegian Staff

The Southwest Men's Center will attempt to discover new insights into the lives and sexuality of men this Sunday in a conference on Men and Masculinity.

According to Frank Dorman of the Southwest Men's Center, the conference is designed to increase consciousness of the need for men to change in their own self-interests, and is the first of its kind in New England.

The conference will feature guest speakers and workshops designed primarily for men, but women are welcome, said Dorman.

Dr. Joseph Pleck, a Distinguished Visitors Program (DVP) speaker and co-editor of Men and Masculinity, will highlight the conference at 8 p.m. in the Student Union Ballroom with a speech entitled "Our Male Role". Pleck is presently with the Institute for Social Research in Ann Arbor, Michigan, and will be a UMass faculty member next semester.

Dr. Julius Lester, a UMass professor in the Afro American Studies department, will give a keynote address on "Fathers and Sons" at 1 p.m. in the Campus Center Auditorium (CCA). 20 workshops will also be held Sunday afternoon and three films will be shown.

Dorman emphasized the workship on male Sexual Health, which is open to men only. Topics for discussion include, "Trips we lay on ourselves to cause sexual disfunction; New and not so new sexual fallacies; Female multiple orgasm: threat or treat? and How to move toward sexual eufunction."

The film "Self-examination of the Testes", will be shown and other male health issues will be discussed.

Registration for the conference will be at noon, Sunday, on the first floor of the Campus Center. Registration fee for students is $.50 and $1 for non-students. Dorman said no one would be turned away for lack of money.

There will also be a catered dinner at 6 p.m. in room 101 in the Campus Center. The cost will be $1.50 and should be paid at registration. There is a limit of 100 persons, and the dinner will be on a first-come-first-serve basis.

Workshops at 2 p.m. will include: —Boyhood Sport: The Proving Ground?, CC 801, Kent Poey. —Men's Counseling, CC 805, Steve Dworkin. —Straight-Gay-Bisexual: Differing Perspectives, CC 803, Doug Friedman (Men only).

Vinie Burrows in solo

Vinie Burrows will bring her one woman show, WALK TOGETHER CHILDREN, to the Campus Center Auditorium on Monday evening, April 25, at 8:00 p.m. This program is sponsored by the Student Activities Office and is a part of the Third World Women's Week on this campus. In her monolouge presentation of some of the best of Black literature and history, Vinie Burrows uses poetry, prose and song to try to tell what it means to be Black in America today. Her show takes one from the hole of a slave ship to the auction block, through the ghettos to hope for tomorrow. It is a journey of tears, laughter, deep burning anger, desperation, and determined hope.

The vibrant Ms. Burrows runs the gamut from courageous Sojourner Truth to Langston Hughes' racy, Alberta K. Johnson. She takes the audience on a thrilling journey reliving Black experience in this country over the past 200 years. Using a bare stage and no props, the Broadway actress who has been called a "magnificent performer" by the New York Times artfully weaves in songs from Black music to highlight her dramatic portrayals.

Ms. Burrows made her Broadway debut with Helen Hays in THE WISTERIA TREES. She has been in six other Broadway shows, appearing with Ossie Davis, Mary Martin, David Wayne, Godfrey Cambridge and others. She has played in off-broadway in THE BLACKS and THE WORLDS OF SHAKESPEARE.

Since its inception, Vinie Burrows has performed WALK TOGETHER CHILDREN in over 500 university and college theatres. She made her third European tour in 1975 as both a delegate and performer at the World Congress of Women. In January of this year, she was a featured American performer at FESTAC '77, the 2nd World Black and African Festival of Arts and Culture held in Lagos, Nigeria; she has been invited to return later this year for an extensive tour.

The material she presents in WALK TOGETHER CHILDREN offers a seldom seen view of black writings and the black experience in America. Perhaps no other theatrical presentations has even given audiences so dramatic a study of changing black attitudes and the vivid drams of black life in America from slavery to present.

Vinie Burrows has also created 6 additional solo programs in her repertoire, most notably AFRICA FIRE!, a retelling of the myths, folklore, and legends of Africa with drumming and dancing; and SISTER! SISTER!, her salute to women of all ages, races, classes and beliefs.

WALK TOGETHER CHILDREN reopened in New York City last season and the new edition of the highly acclaimed program broke all records to become the longest running one person show in off Broadway annals. This program has been released on two albums by Spoken Arts, Inc. of New Rochelle, N.Y.

Ms. Burrows explains her reasons for doing a one woman show:

This program will be a Free Admission Presentation and is open to the General Public. Please call Sarah Williamson, 545-3600 for any questions.

MONDAY, APRIL 25, 1977 8:00 p.m.; Campus Center Auditorium, University of Massachusetts, Amherst, Massachusttts.

Amherst - follow suit!

The Town of Amherst is being asked to condemn the racist So. African regime and take various measures opposing U.S. corporate investment in that country.

The reasons are simple. The apartheid system of South Africa has resulted in extreme levels of oppression and exploitation. The black majority which makes up over 70 per cent of the population is subjugated for the profits of the white minority and multi-national corporation.

Blacks have no political or economic rights. They cannot vote or hold public office. They are forced to live on 13 per cent of the land while the white minority controls 87 per cent. Blacks, by law, cannot hold jobs supervising whites. They cannot form trade unions. Blacks must pay for their education, while for whites it is free and of higher quality. Per capita income for Blacks is $117, for whites it is $2373.

The over 300 U.S. corporations with investments of over $1.5 billion in South Africa provide support and credibility to that regime. It is their high rates of profit — 17 to 21 per cent that serve to perpetuate the racist exploitation of black workers.

The Town of Amherst should join with the growing international movement to support the liberation struggles of the black majority in So. Africa. The U.N. the World Council of Churches and many other concerned groups and organizations have condemned apartheid and called for U.S. corporate withdrawal. In 1975, the city of Gary, Indiana stopped doing business with U.S. corp. that perpetuate apartheid.

The Town of Amherst does business with First Nat'l Bank of Boston, Burroughs Machine, and Xerox which all support the racist So. African regime.

FIRST NAT'L BANK OF BOSTON — Lent $30 mill. through its So. African subsidiary to develop the So. African economy, while forcing cutbacks in Boston school, hospitals, and other services.

BURROUGHS MACHINES — Accounts for 8-9 per cent of the computers installed in So. Africa. One of its customers includes the DeBeers mining company which is notorious for its exploitation of black workers in the gold and diamond mines. Wages for black workers are considerably below wages for whites. Company officials have stated that most black employees perform menial tasks and are making only very slow progress toward skilled positions. XEROX — Controls 35 per cent of So. Africa's copying industry and has assets of about $14 mill. Its profits have grown rapidly in recent years. There will be a petition, which we hope you will sign, asking the Town of Amherst to stop dealing with the mentioned U.S. corporations. The demands will read as follows:

TO: Amherst Town Officials

WE, the undersigned registered voters of Amherst, call on the Board of Selectmen, and if necessary a special Town Meeting to decide:

1. That the Town of Amherst should go on record condemning the racist South African regime and urging U.S. corporations to withdraw from South Africa.
2. That the Town of Amherst should cease doing business with U.S. corporations with significant investments in South Africa when alternatives are available. Those corporations presently include Xerox, Burroughs Machines, and the First National Bank of Boston.
3. Copies of this adopted resolution be forwarded to the appropriate representatives of each of the above companies.
4. That the Town of Amherst should sell any securities it holds in corporations which operate in South Africa (re. Trust Funds).
5. The Town of Amherst should send a representative to the County Pension Fund Program to urge the Program to divest of itself of any securities it holds in corporations which operate in South Africa.

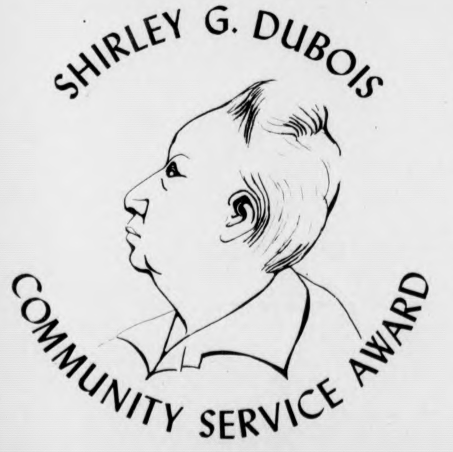
For those of you who haven't seen a Women's Lacrosse game yet, you've missed some serious games.

Julie Hall has scored 11 goals in three games and is the teams leading scorer.

To say the lady is sensational is not enough. Much to the pleasure of the crowd, Julie spins, fakes, and scores on all that approach her defensively. To say the least, Julie is unstoppable!

Julie has shown what she can do, now I'd like to see you brothers and sisters show your support. Come to the home games!



The Shirley Graham DuBois Award will be given to the student who has made the greatest contribution to the Third World Community. The names and pictures of the candidates will be posted in the lobby of the New Africa House with the various activities outlined.

Voting will take place on Tuesday, April 26th and Wednesday, April 27th in the New Africa House.

Israeli's independence--a day to celebrate

By ELLEN LEVY
Collegian Staff

Independence: the quality or state of being self-governing.

Independence is a highly cherished concept, especially by those who are not independent. This Saturday, Israelis will be able to say they have experienced Independence for 29 years.

This Sunday, UMass students will hold a celebration in honor of Israeli Independence Day, in the Cape Cod Lounge of the Student Union at 2:30 p.m. Attractions include music, dance, food, products of and information about Israel.

Arie Reichal, a native Israeli UMass graduate student, said Israel Independence Day is "a unique holiday. It is a mixture of sadness and happiness, for it should be noted that Independence Day is the Day after Mourning Day."

We read in history books about those who fought for America's development. In Israel it is quite different. Some of the founding fathers might be a next door neighbor or a relative. Almost all Israelis can honestly say they have fought for their freedom and for the independence of their nation.

The Jewish Congress was established and began a drive to buy land from Turkey. Jews slowly immigrated to what is now Israel. When the British took over the region after World War I, they pledged to establish a Jewish homeland. This pledge was finally redeemed in 1948 when the United Nations granted Israel nationhood.

Independence is not only a day of celebration for Israelis, but for Jews all over the world. The Jewish people have been widely dispersed throughout the world on the last 2000 years. In 29 years, they have had the right to go back to their homeland.

Reichal said, "As soon as the Mourning Day ends, we start to celebrate "Yom Ha 'atzmaoot". Usually at 6 p.m. there is a loud siren which is heard everywhere, the sign to stop mourning and start celebrating.

"When I was a child, I took for granted that there is the state of Israel, and the Mourning Day just meant going with the other students to the memorial parks to 'remember'. Unfortunately, since the Six Day War and the Yom Kippur War, nobody has had to remind me about the meaning of these Days.

"To me, Independence Day means the high price we pay for our Independence. We do not only celebrate something we achieved 29 years; we celebrate our continuing efforts to survive as a state."

Elise Goldman, a UMass organizer for the campus celebration said, "In Israel, freedom is not taken for granted, rather it is something that the Israeli people have to work for. As someone who has been in Israel, I understand, to a certain extent, why the Israelis have fought so hard for their homeland. Talking to an Israeli in the street, one can see the pride that they feel about their country. I still feel the same pride because we have the same heritage."

IN Israel, there are both formal shows and programs and informal celebrations. At UMass, there will be a more informal party atmosphere.

Warrens' voice grows weary—Melanie signs as replacement

By BERNARD DAVIDOW
Collegian Staff

The popular folksinger, Melanie, has replaced Jennifer Warrens as the second act at the May 7 Spring Concert in Alumni Stadium.

Warrens, whose hit single "The Right Time of the Night" is currently fourth in the nation, according to national billboard charts, cancelled out yesterday because "her voice is giving out," according to Jack Albeck, a concert coordinator.

Warrens is on the last leg of a 60-day tour and is scheduled to record her first album next month.

Albeck said Warrens' agent called him 9:30 a.m. yesterday. At 10 a.m. he and fellow coordinator Bonnie Levitin reached Melanie's agent to fill the vacancy.

Melanie Satka now joins five other artists playing at the concert.

The New Jersey native released her most recent album, "Photograph", last year. Her hit singles include "Brand New Key", "Lay Down," "Peace Will Come," and "Look What They've Done to my Song, Ma."

Both she and Richie Havens, who is also playing at the concert, performed at the 1969 Woodstock festival.

Albeck said the gates to the free concert, will open at 10 a.m. The first act, Cojunto Libre, is scheduled to play from 10:30 to 11:30 a.m. Melanie follows from noon to 1 p.m.

Richie Havens is next from 1:30 to 2:30 p.m., Pousette Dart Band, 3 to 4 p.m., Procol Harum, 4:30 to 5:30 p.m., and finishing up from 6 to 7 p.m. Southside Johnnie and the Asbury Jukes.

Food and beer will be sold at the concert, Albeck said.

No cans, bottles or coolers will be allowed in the stadium, Albeck said, because of the threat the empty containers pose to athletes who must play on the athletic fields.

Construction of the stage will begin a week from next Tuesday, according to Albeck. There are now about 150 students who have volunteered to work on the concert as backstage hands and security.

Greenough sets pace for mini-marathon

By NIKKI ARONSON
Collegian Staff

In conjunction with Central Area Government, Greenough dorm will sponsor a seven-mile road race Sunday, April 24 as a part of Central Area's combined resources to create a Spring Arts Festival this month.

Greenough Head of Residence Rick Bell and dorm resident Bill Westerland have mapped out a seven-mile track route that will begin and end in front of the dorm. Registration for the event will begin at 10 a.m. in Greenough lobby. Maps will be handed out during registration period for the 1 p.m. race.

"We want to encourage the amateur and beginning runners to come Sunday," said Westerland. "This is a run for fun."

No entry fee is required for the event. Greenough resident Michael Bars explained, "There will be a $15 gift certificate donated by The Sports Store in Amherst for the winner and a $10 coupon from Fenton's Athletic Equipment of Amherst for second place."

The first 10 runner-ups will receive souvenir t-shirts and a limited amount of successful contestants will be able to choose among the art works of the area residents to be displayed Sunday.

"The race is open to everyone," said Bars, "and I think everyone who comes will have a good time."

★ Rape — 'perpetuated'

Orange", "Lipstick", and "Butch Cassidy and the Sundance Kid."

These stories and scripts must be written by men, because no woman truly wants to be raped.

"When women admit that they fantasize on being raped, it is just that — a fantasy," says Ruth Fessenden of the UMass Rape Task Force. "The significant difference is that it is their fantasy, they are in control and can decide what happens. Therefore, they're not fantasizing a true rape situation."

Rape is an act of hostility and aggression, not a convenient outlet for some oversexed psychotic.

Susan Brownmiller, author of Against Our Will, Men, Women and Rape, contends that rape is the phenomenon of male power over women, not an individual pathology. Brownmiller sees the threat exercise and acceptance of force against women as a deliberate process of intimidation by which all men keep all women in a state of fear. She holds men responsible for the rapists in their midst.

I thought her interpretation radical until I looked at the history of the deliberate subordination of women.

Rape in warfare was always encouraged during ancient times, and women were usually considered as guilty as the offender when raped during peacetimes. Only a virgin who had not already been betrothed could legally be raped. It was not until the 13th century in England that rape was recognized as a crime against women.

Brownmiller speculates that, in return for protection, women agreed to monogamy (through marriage).

Yet women are raped in their own marriages. I did not understand how this could be so until I realized what my perception of marriage must have been based on; that a woman gives up her right to refuse when she says "I do". Yet I believe everyone has the option to say "no" and that marriage does not indicate ownership of one person by another. So, yet, it does make sense that rape can occur in marriage. It will be one helluva test case in court though.

Our legal system has consistently placed the burden of proof (and guilt) upon the victim. The dialogue is well known, "Do you often go without wearing a bra?", "How many men have you had sexual intercourse with?"

Unfortunately, men cannot understand the female reality of rape because, according to Brownmiller, they have been too concerned with the possibility of a false rape charge.

The victim is held responsible for her physical defense, too, although there is no protection technique guaranteed to provide precious get-away time. Males often tell me to just poke the assailant in the eyes or knee him in the groin. However, most women have become too socialized to act in an aggressive, violent manner. Even if she knew the right moves, her assailant may be far too strong, quick, carrying a weapon, or see her struggle as sexual excitement, or even as more of a challenge for him to gain control of and injure the victim.

Besides, most victims, particularly on the UMass-Amherst campus, are raped by someone with whom they are, at least, acquainted. It's not usually the stranger in the bushes or the dark alley routine. Rape generally occurs in the victim's or rapist's residence. One woman was raped at her own wedding reception.

Nor are victims always young women (or anywhere near as beautiful as movie makers and magazine writers would have us believe). Rape victims are men (usually in prisons), children, and women — handicapped, from two months old to 90, of all colors and social backgrounds.

After gathering much information on the subject, I thought, "So what can I do? What can my male friends do to combat rape?"

There are obvious actions. Women pick up other women hitchhikers, carry enough money to a cab, bus or, at least, a phone call, and we can seriously consider how to deal with a rapist (like the nice guy you just met at a party who wants to take you to his place).

We can start evaluating the way in which the media depicts women, and men's attitudes towards us.

"Myths, such as 'every woman secretly wants to be raped,, 'all she needs is a good lay', and 'she asked for it' help excuse rape. No person wants to be beaten, sexually violated and dehumanized, but men and women frequently keep myths alive by thoughtless joking and avoidance of serious discussions about attitudes and values," said a pamphlet prepared by the Rape Task Force.

"Women and men can cooperate in raising consciousness about rape and the objectification of women," said Fessenden. "It's exciting that women and men get together to fight the (Albert Sparks) pornography issue here on campus."

This Sunday, April 24, the Southwest Men's Center is sponsoring a conference on Men and Masculinity in the Campus Center. Along with various workshops, the film "Rape Culture" will be screened.

Awareness, per se, will not eliminate rape, but it is the only way to challenge and alter the cultural and legal practices which tout and tolerate this crime.

Next week: Who is the offender? Who is the victim?

★ Cheddi Jagan

Dr. Michael Thelwell of the Afro American Studies department, introduced Jagan as "A man who comes out of a period of militant leaders who led their countries out of the bonds of colonialism to independence. Jagan is a man of great historical stature."

Jagan outlined a plan by which Third World nations could narrow the gap between them and the developed nations of the world.

"The first step is to dismantle the existing economic structure. Third World nations must nationalize their mines, banks, industries, insurance companies, and plantations. If they do not gain control of these resources the developed nations of the world will continue to drain them.

"The second step" said Jagan, "is to expand the state's influence in the economic sector. This is not to say that there will be no private property, but it will be less important.

"Planned economic development of the country's resources is the third stop in narrowing the gap," he said. "The emphasis should be on the industrial and agricultural sectors of the economy."

Jagan stated that Third World nations must develop close links with the socialist world. "We cannot remain neutral," he said, "these countries that have remained neutral have been swallowed by imperialist powers.

"We must take these steps and accept the risks that go along with them if we are to become independent," said Jagan. "Political independence without economic independence is nothing, because we are still at the mercy of the nation that controls our resources and industry."

SUMMER SESSION WITH THE STARS

SUMMER IN THE CAPITAL DISTRICT

SIXTEEN COLLEGES OFFER 1400 COURSES IN 45 FIELDS

Sixteen different colleges and universities in New York State's Capital District will offer 1400 courses this summer in 45 cultural and job related fields. Over 1000 regular and visiting faculty at 2-year, 4-year and graduate institutions will teach both day and evening courses. The Capital District is a summer resort area, too, famous for its performances by theatre, dance, music and popular celebrities. With such a galaxy of colleges and universities, excellent summer courses, and rich cultural opportunities any interested student can study with the stars this summer.

A complete listing of these 1400 courses is contained in a single publication available on request. Send in the coupon below or telephone, collect if necessary, to (518) 785-3219.

Heronemus said the United States could be totally dependent on wind and solar energy by 1985. He outlined 12 oceanic thermal power plants which would allow the world to be dependent on solar and wind energy. These included India, the Ivory Coast, Iran, so they could save precious petroleum, and Cuba if "Castro stepped down and allowed a democracy in Cuba. If we are going to give them something, we should get something in return," Heronemus said.

Following the close of his speech and a long standing ovation, Heronemus was presented with the Chancellors Medal which is awarded to all speakers of the Chancellors Lecture Series.

Workshops aid in decisions

Students who need help making decisions about career choices can find it through a series of Career Decision-Making workshops offered by the Student Services Office of the Division of Continuing Education.

The workshops offer exercises and discussion which teach the members the process of making a good decision and help them to get in touch with essential "internal" criteria such as self-knowledge about values, discovery of and belief in one's skills, and awareness of one's interests.

Self-knowledge is taught through workshop participants considering such questions as "Would I sacrifice job security for potentially great financial profit?," "Is where I live important to me?," "Is it an important value of mine to influence people?," and "How do I want to do this?".

Career decision-making, usually requiring only a $5 fee for continuing education students already enrolled for workshops or credit courses, will also be low cost for the summer. For information contact Garrett McAuliffe, Hills House North, 545-3430, or Steve Keane, Hills House North, 545-3440.

Luce program seeks UM candidates

UMass has been invited to submit nominees for the Luce Scholars Program to the Henry Luce Foundation. The intent of the program is to provide an intensive experience in Asia for an outstanding group of young Americans (from fields other than Asian Studies and International Relations) who would not otherwise expect, during the normal course of their careers, to have such an opportunity.

Despite its name, the Luce Scholars Program is experiential rather than academic in its approach. At the heart of the enterprise are internships and job placements that are arranged for each participating Scholar on the basis of his or her professional interests and background.

Anyone with a 3.6 cum or above interested in being considered for nomination should contact Maryelise or Sterling Lamet at the International Programs Office, 239 Whitmore, 545-0746 for further information.

Land Form change

There is an important change in the description of Land Forms (ENV DES 353) in the Summer Session catalog. The course is open to anyone, undergraduate or graduate, rather than only to design students as the catalog stipulates. Maximum enrollment is 22.

Woman denied abortion; hear father's plea first

TRENTON, N.J. (UPI) — An unwed expectant mother yesterday was ordered by the state Supreme Court not to have an abortion until her spurned boyfriend can present legal pleas for the child's right to birth.

"It is not something you should go and step on like an ant," said John Rothenberger, 23, the father of the unborn child.

Justice Robert Clifford issued a temporary injunction barring Wendy Chasalow, 19, Morristown, from having an abortion until the full court can consider the case on Monday. Miss Chasalow had been scheduled to have the abortion yesterday.

Rothenberger, of Orange, asked the court to appoint him as guardian to protect the child's rights.

"She doesn't like to see animals killed. But now she wants to kill the baby," Rothenberger, an unemployed construction worker, told a news conference at his attorney's office.

Asked earlier if he wanted to marry Miss Chasalow, Rothenberger replied, "I already asked her twice since I found out she was pregnant."

He said he appealed to the court because he has "a father's duty to protect his child from the moment of conception."

Rothenberger said he might not have gone to court to block the abortion if Miss Chasalow had spent more time making the decision. He said, however, she was under pressure from her family.

"She has a family to lose and a college education to lose. She has just me to gain. She has a baby to gain, too, a human life," Rothenberger said.

"I believe she said to me, 'I don't want to be tied down with it,' " Rothenberger said.

Environmental standards may interfere

Nation coal industry productive, says Carter

LOUISVILLE, Ky. (AP) — America's coal industry believes it can produce one billion tons of coal annually by 1985, as proposed by President Carter, but it warns that strict environmental standards may prevent consumers from using the coal.

"The productive capacity is there," Rex Chaney, a spokesman for the National Coal Association, said yesterday. "We made a survey less than a year ago that indicates that the industry is planning about 500 million tons of new capacity over the next 10 years, so the plans are on the drawing board to achieve this objective.

"A whole lot depends on what the Congress does in response to the administration line and how vigorously the administration pushes some of the more restrictive environmental proposals," he said.

During a speech before a joint session of Congress on Wednesday, Carter said that one of the goals of his national energy policy "will be conversion from scarce fuels to coal whenever possible," and called for an annual production increase of 400 million tons. About 665 million tons of coal were produced last year.

The industry currently faces a two-fold obstacle to increased production: proposed federal surface mine legislation that would dictate mining practices and reclamation, and clean air standards governing the use of coal by industry and utilities.

The Clean Air Act of 1970 set restrictions on the amount of sulfur emissions produced from burning coal. However, an industry spokesman said utilities used about 200 million tons of coal last year that were technically in violation of the clean air standards.

Other factors to be considered are the availability of capital to finance expansion of coal operations, availability of rail transportation to move the product, and long-standing labor-management struggles, the spokesman said.

U.S. Steel Corp. President David Roderick estimated that utilities will need a whopping $70 billion to convert to coal-fired plants while the coal industry itself will need $20 billion to open the necessary new mines by 1985. Railroads will require $8 billion to gear up to handle the coal.

"I've seen nothing but efforts to toughen the air quality standards and impose federal strip mine legislation," said Tom Duncan, president of the Kentucky Coal Association. "We say we need to produce 400 million tons more each year when in fact the substantive things happening are making it harder to mine and harder to burn coal. Those things say more to me than Carter's rhetoric."

Dan Andert, a spokesman for Peabody Coal Co., the nation's largest producer with 69.7 million tons last year, is waiting for Carter to draw the line between production and the environment.

"Environmental concerns in the process of mining obviously have to be considered," said Andert. "Unfortunately, many people feel that mining and environmental concerns are diametrically opposed, which is not necessarily so.

"I guess what we're basically saying is that we can live with some restrictions relative to the environment as long as they are imposed with a certain amount of reason. We realize you can't just go around and tear things up and forget about it."

Carter's energy plan— some liked it, some didn't...

By United Press International

Some of New England's citizens liked President Carter's energy plan. Some didn't. And some felt one way and the other.

"It's really needed," said Brad Ashley, 23, of Pawtucket, R.I., who registered a Japanese-made compact car yesterday. "I've just been in England and Scotland and seen how they all have small cars. Then I came back here and it seemed wasteful to see everybody driving around in Cadillacs. They should get them off the street."

"I was thinking of sending him a bow and arrow," Bob Shaw, operator of a Manchester, N.H. service station said of Carter. "It sounds like Robin Hood's proposal to rob the rich and help the poor.

"But he'll be making so many poor people there won't be any rich."

Daniel Petrocelli, 31, a Providence, R.I., funeral home director, said he would switch to a smaller car for his personal use but doesn't think compact cars can be used in his business. He said he hoped there would be special rebates for gas-guzzling limousines used in funerals.

"We can't live without them," Petrocelli said. "He'll have to give us some kind of allowance or funerals won't go on."

Maynard Rowe of Augusta, Maine, owner-operator of a truck from which he sells hot dogs, said the President "hit the nail on the head". He said he would add insulation to his home.

"I think the President's excise tax on big cars is a good idea," Rowe said. "I wouldn't buy a big car. I would buy a camper though. The President doesn't want to charge excess taxes on campers, does he?"

William Depersis of Farmington, Conn., said his family would adjust its habits to save on energy.

"I'll get rid of my big car and get a small one like a Honda Accord because I have to travel a lot," Depersis said.

"We'll probably use my wife's car less frequently, too."

"We'll change the thermostats in the house too," Depersis said. "They have settings for 'warm and cool.' We'll get new ones that we can set at specific heats."

Jeanette Brown, 53, of Mexico, Maine, a part-time clerk in a small grocery store, called the energy plan a "completely ridiculous gimmick."

"I don't know what the solution to the energy crisis is but there has to be a better way than this," she said.

An economist's point of view...

NEW YORK (AP) — President Carter's energy program "would be a disaster" if adopted, conservative Nobel Prize-winning economist Milton Friedman said yesterday.

But liberal economists were equally adamant that the Carter plan will work.

Otto Eckstein, a Harvard economist and member of the Council of Economic Advisers under President Johnson, said "the program will largely accomplish" the President's goals.

By 1980, Eckstein projected a slight increase in inflation, a small drop in the Gross National Product and an 0.2 per cent rise in unemployment.

But these "short-term burdens on the economy are really moderate," he said. "This is a very modest price to pay for solving the problem."

The President's tough energy conservation plan unveiled Wednesday night called for higher prices and new taxes on cars and fuel and backed use of alternative power sources.

But according to Friedman, "The problem in energy is the extent to which government has interfered with the market, and Mr. Carter's solution is to interfere still further."

The program "will make energy less available and introduce inefficiencies," Friedman said, adding he doubts it will be passed in its current form by Congress.

Eckstein, president of the economic consulting firm Data Resources Inc., said in a telephone interview from his Lexington, Mass., office that major problem areas are the coal and auto industries.

Carter wants to push coal development in his program and would ban industries and utilities from burning natural gas or oil in new boilers.

Except for uncertainty over coal supplies, the program "has the potential to accomplish the President's goals," Eckstein said.

"We estimate the impact of all these measures" on carmakers "is likely to reduce the dollar shipments of the auto industry by 4 to 6 per cent," he said. "However, we think the unit car sales will be little affected" because of the rebates.

In San Francisco, Bank of America Vice President R. Gene Conaster said, "I wouldn't want to say it is the ultimate program or that it won't work.

"It's certainly better than no program at all," said Conaster, who heads economic research at the nation's biggest commercial bank.

"The thing that troubles me most is getting it passed," he said.

At New York's Citibank, chief economist Leif Olsen's major dislike is that "the program contains disincentives to the increasing production of new energy resources."

"The tax structure will encourage the exploration for more oil outside the U.S. than within," he said.

On the plus side, Olsen applauded "the recognition that price has to be employed to allocate the resources.

Elderly hard-hit by criminal acts

WASHINGTON (UPI) — A congressional study disclosed yesterday the nation's elderly are not victimized by crime at a disproportionate rate, but suffer much more.

"Financially, physically and emotionally, they are the least able to cope with the loss or injury that results from a criminal act," the study said.

It said that with half of the elderly at or below the poverty level, and most on fixed incomes, they lack the financial capability to replace or repair stolen or damaged property.

The 147-page study was released by Rep. Edward Roybal, D-Calif., chairman of the House Aging Subcommittee on Housing and Consumer Interests, and Rep. John Hammerschmidt, R-Ark., who proposed legislation to compensate elderly crime victims.

The Royal-Hammerschmidt bill would provide reimbursements through state programs of up to $1,000 for victims 62 years old and over for physical injuries or loss of essential property.

The report said available data, including information from the FBI and Law Enforcement, Assistant Administration, independent studies, and congressional hearings, led the subcommittee "to the tentative conclusion that the elderly are not disproportionately the victims of crime."

But it said weaknesses in applying the data to the elderly caused the panel to believe a more refined study would show the elderly rate higher.

It cited an LEAA study that showed the elderly are victims of violent crimes at a rate of 8 per 1,000, compared to a general population rate of 32 per 1,000; the elderly are victims of theft at a 22 per 1,000 overall, and elderly are victims of household crimes at a rate of 107 per 1,000, compared to 217 per 1,000 for the general population.

But the report said the elderly victim rate is increasing, and because of fear of violent crime, "many of the elderly have become prisoners within their own homes or apartments."

The study said most elderly crime occurs within the same race, reflecting housing patterns; burglary was the most predominent crime against that age group, and the elderly are being victimized by youths.

THE DEAN OF BEER'S QUICKIE QUIZ.

Q: The best water for beer comes from:
a) Big Duck Mountain.
b) Underground from Tijuana.
c) A small store in Macon, Ga.
d) None of the above.

A: (d) The way some beer drinkers talk about water, you'd think Alice found it in Wonderland.

Not that water isn't important to a beer's taste. It is. Very important.

But the fact is, virtually all brewers filter and further purify their brewing water.

And Schlitz doesn't stop there. They put their water through what they believe is the most sophisticated purifying process of any brewer in the world.

So when they're through, it's purer than the purest springwater.

THERE'S JUST ONE WORD FOR BEER.

WASHINGTON: Pre. Carter meets at the White House with Portuguese Prime Minister Mario Soares. Carter said: "we're very proud of our friendship with Portugal. I believe it's going to be even better in the future. (UPI)

Carter meets Portuguese Prime Minister Soares

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Carter met with Portuguese Prime Minister Mario Soares yesterday to discuss joint strategy for gaining international financial support for Portugal's faltering economy.

Carter gave Soares a warm Oval Office welcome, declaring he is "very proud of our friendship and partnership with Portugal" and predicting closer relations.

The Carter administration has taken the lead in encouraging large-scale international financial support for Portugal, which has been plagued recently by worker rebellion, a 30-per-cent inflation rate, high unemployment, lagging production and political agitation from both extremes.

While posing for photographers, Soares replied "not very promising" when Carter asked him about the economic situation in Portugal.

The administration has asked Congress for a $300-million balance-of-payments allocation for Portugal as part of a proposed $1.5-billion package to which other nations are being asked to contribute.

Portugal also is seeking support from the International Monetary Fund, and this issue was discussed at a meeting between Soares and IMF Managing Director H. Johannes Witeveen.

It was understood that Soares' talks with American officials touched on ways in which the two countries could work together to ensure maximum international support for Portugal.

Soares, who arrived Wednesday, is here on a private visit. There was no welcoming ceremony for him on the White House south lawn but his activities contained most of the other trappings of a full-fledged official visit.

Aside from Carter and Witeveen, Soares scheduled meetings with Treasury Secretary Michael Blumenthal; Zbigniew Brzezinski, presidential adviser on national security; congressional leaders; and World Bank President Robert S. McNamara.

The Carter administration has placed high priority on establishing a close relationship with Portugal, a NATO ally struggling to establish democratic roots after long years of dictatorship. The Portuguese observe the third anniversary of their revolution next Monday.

Soares has tried to strenghthen Portugal's ties with Western Europe by reinforcing its links with NATO and applying for membership in the Common Market.

Soares came to the United States to receive an award from the International League for Human Rights.

General is executed

BANGKOK, Thailand (AP) — A former top general accused but never tried for leading an abortive military coup was executed yesterday by a single burst from the submachine gun of a one-man firing squad, military sources said.

It was Thailand's first execution for political reasons in almost 40 years. The doomed man, Chalard Hiranyasiri, had also been accused of killing a progovernment army commander in the coup attempt last month.

Witnesses said Chalard's eyes were covered by a white cloth and just before the execution he told the police corporal who was to kill him:

"Before you are ready to shoot, tell me so I can prepare myself to enter heaven in peace."

A Buddhist monk preached a sermon to the 53-year-old former deputy army commander in his final minutes, and the executioner asked if he had anything to tell his family. Chalard, appearing calm, handed the corporal a will, the witnesses said.

Government-run Radio Thailand did not announce the execution, which took place inside a prison just outside Bangkok. But it said an investigation had determined that Chalard shot and killed Maj. Gen. Aroon Tavathasin, commander of the 1st Army Division, as the coup attempt went awry.

The official broadcast also said four accomplices, including Chalard's son, Maj. Uswin Hiranyasiri, had been sentenced to life imprisonment.

Informed sources said the sentences were handed down under Article 21 of the constitution, which gives the prime minister broad powers to summarily punish those who have engaged in activities endangering national security, the economy or public morals.

Military sources said the final decision to execute Chalard was made Thursday morning when Prime Minister Tanin Kraivixien met with his cabinet and military advisory council.

Chalard was accused of leading 300 soldiers into Bangkok on March 26 to seize power. The rebels shot Aroon — apparently when he refused to cooperate — and seized four key government buildings in downtown Bangkok. But they were unable to win support among other soldiers and surrendered after a few hours.

Reference books show that the last such execution took place in 1938 after an antigovernment rebellion.

AHORA demands rights

To the Editor:

Considering the facts and happenings that have been occurring these past few days, we, the Latin-American students here at UMass have found it necessary to clarify the situation with our organization named AHORA.

In our present state, AHORA is facing the Student Senate with the motion to reconsider our budget for fiscal year '78. Our budget has been cut 85 per cent. Other organizations have been cut, but only up to 20 per cent. We consider this action a threat to our existence as the only voice of the Latin Community at UMass.

Clearly, this action is a Senate movement to eliminate our organization by controlling our funds. The Senate has told us that our activities have not been cut but that our activities monies have been put into a joint account under the Finance Committee created recently. Every activity will have to go under their final consideration.

AHORA was not satisfied with that decision and we decided to appeal our case with the Student Senate body. Last Wednesday, we presented our case at a Senate meeting and faced a completely hostile attitude.

A clear cut example of this attitude was expressed by the Chairperson of the Finance Committee. This senator attacked the organization with racist questions about our existence as an organization and our goals. He expressed himself opposed to our budget and made a suggestion that we should promote fund-raising activities in order to maintain the organization.

This is only one of the many problems we will face with the Finance Committee if the Student Senate body does not overrule the decision to cut our budget.

The Senator's attitude is not only racist but ignorant as well. As members of the Third World, we have been constantly oppressed at UMass. Third World groups are the last to be considered for anything and are the first to be eliminated.

How does this senator expect the organization to charge admission for every event when the Third World community is financially as well as socially and politically oppressed constantly? We have always faced hostile attitudes toward our activities and the white community does not even attend our activities when they are free of charge, least of all when they are charged admission.

AHORA's problem is not a recent one — it has existed since the birth of our organization and is a very common problem we face in our community daily.

If we decide to accept the Budgets Committee's original decision not only AHORA will be in danger this year but next year, our Bilingual Program will be in danger and our existence as part of the Third World community at UMass will be eliminated totally.

We believe that the Student Senate goals are to defend all the students' interests, not just the majority. It is a shame to have to acknowledge the fact that the Student Senate is just a club which caters to the interests of the administration and not of the students.

We, as Latin-American students, are strongly opposed to being manipulated as puppets, which is the Senate's intention. We have been oppressed for a long time and we've decided to stop it!

In our struggle, we are expecting all the support of the progressive organizations on campus. As Third World Groups, it is time to demand our rights.

Next Wednesday April 27th, AHORA will face the Student Senate again to hear their final decision. We expect to have everyone's support. The meeting will be held at the Campus Center in room 101.

Our struggle is your struggle!

¡The people united will never be defeated!

Departments: Support the struggle

To the Editor:

Most are aware of the recent five year plan proposed by Provost Puryear, and many are appalled at the projections. In the report it appeared as though the economics department was being granted an extra seven positions over the next five years. We would like to point out that those positions are being awarded to the department only because the department has lost ten positions in the last two years. So, this represents a net decrease, not increase as one could surmise from Puryear's report. We would like to affirm our solidarity with all those departments on the verge of cuts and elimination, and recognize the fact that the projections which may appear as partisan or positively dramatic may not be so at all. We advocate that all students whether in departments being cut, or not, show support for one another. It is only with such support that we can overcome the progressive disintegration of UMass as an institution of quality education.

Amherst unified:

Students and townspeople

To the Editor:

I fail to understand the logic in Bob Melia's thoroughly judgemental, pedantic, and distorted commentary of Thursday, April 21 concerning the run-off election of three year town meeting members. The students, Mr. Melia claims, committed a major tactical faux pas by electing a life long resident of Amherst, Mr. Rice. A show of weakness for the student slate, and previously unrecognized strength for the minority of townspeople, he professes. In actuality it becomes a Pyrrhic victory at best, for it appears to have further disunified an already splintered group.

Labels are perhaps the most divisive and detrimental apect of American politics and society in general. They attribute negative and positive qualities, sometimes incongruous, to vast and divergent groups of individuals who are undoubtedly unique. Mr. Melia accuses student town meeting members, of which I am one, of being superficial and uninformed, and yet his statements are exemplary of the most mindless, one-dimensional bias imaginable.

Labels such as student and townsperson tell us nothing of a person's ideology or political perspective. To dogmatically consider all students ostensibly liberal and sympathetic to "progressive issues", and all townspeople conservative reactionaries blatantly anti-student is ludicrous. Categorization is blinding, and students, continually targets of this victimization, should most acutely be cognizant of this injustice.

As for Mr. Melia's logic concerning his ultimate withdrawal from Town Meeting upon graduation, I question his grasp on the democratic process. He was admittedly acquiescent about the run-off election from its origin, yet comformed to the general long range plan spouted by the student bloc, which was that Bob resign upon graduation, and we the "liberal students" would appoint another "open-minded" student member.

If we are struggling for just and equal representation after years of repression in town politics, why condescend to make the same treacherous, deceitful power plays as those we denounce? Let us not fall prey to the same manipulative, repressive actions as those we have condemned, especially in the name of students' rights and equal representation.

It is precisely this kind of narrow-minded dogma that is responsible for the poor relations currently existing between townspeople and students. And it is paradoxical that Mr. Melia wishes to quote Karl Marx, a man who continually strove for a breakdown in "classist" entrenchment, rather than a continuation of further exploitive entanglement.

For until we are freed from the self-defeating prejudice of viewing all townspeople as the enemy, we will all students and townspeople continue to wallow in a mire of ineffectuality, trapped in vindictive, confining opposition rather than unified in a sincere effort to control our destinies in Amherst as people not perspectivists.

Student Government blasted

To the Editor:

On Wednesday evening, the Student Government met to discuss the upcoming budget, and being a former Senator, I attended. There is no reason to even ask what we accomplished, because we accomplished a whole hell of a lot less than nothing at all. What I observed in that meeting truly disgusted and appalled me — and I mean me as a person, not a member of the Student Government.

Everything that is either connotated as immaturity, favoritist, and separatist behavior was almost without exception displayed by everyone there. We played an ultimate and most vile game of politics like a bunch of children in a sandbox, and we blew it. Perhaps you will have heard the specifics of what went on and therefore appreciate what I am saying, which is the following. It was the biggest, most ridiculous crock of bullshit I have ever seen.

All I've got to say is this to the Student Government and all others who attended this farce: You better get your heads together and start thinking in terms of the people, namely the students, because if you don't, and quick, you will have no kind of Government at all.

Tow job

Like the blossoms of berry bushes whose appearance heralds the onset of spring, so too have area activists launched a new campaign against the perrenial nemesis Amherst Towing. Every spring I witness a surge of activism. Can it be that revolution is a linear function of Fahrenheit?

The arguments presented by students against Amherst Towing have always fallen along two lines. 1) They are privateering, in more ways than one, against UMass students. They ruthlessly tow as many cars as possible for maximum profit. At times, it has been alleged, they even use unethical-illegal business practices. 2) Anyways, a student run towing service can do the job better, more fairly, and more cheaply.

Until recently, these arguments have held no more water than a dry sponge. For years, people have lined up rying to prove some specific charges against Amherst Towing. Yet, only one actionable misdeed has ever been made against Amherst Towing. This had to do with the DPU forcing Amherst Towing to rollback their rates slightly.

Believe me, the boys on the newstaff of this newspaper would love to print some reasonable proof that Amherst Towing is guilty of malfeasance. They've helped people to line up for years in taking pot-shots at the great straw man in Amherst Towing. Just last winter, I myself investigated the towing of a certain junk car from the Campus Center Garage. I suspected Amherst Towing was acting in collusion with a local salvage firm in a scheme to eprive owners of junkers their rightful salvage fee. My investigation showed that Amherst Towing acted reasonably and justifiably.

Indeed, I know of no instance where Amherst Towing has ever acted improperly. At least, no such impropriety has ever been printed. The closest we have ever come in print is the tire iron incident of last fall and the recent rate rollback.

Face it; people who park in fire lanes, or spaces reserved for the handicapped, or even in clearly marked sticker lots, deserve to get towed. They do not deserve the right to complain. But when they do anyway, they inevitably sound like, "Wa-a-a-h. I got towed I don't like to get towed. I don't wanna get towed. Big bad bullies! Boo-hoo!" Perhaps weeping is how they get arguments against Amherst Towing to hold water.

On the other hand, the forces favoring student-run towing have finally come up with a sensible, feasible plan. They have stated what equipment they will need. They have stated how much it will cost to buy this equipment. They have stated how they will finance this plan. And, they have told how they plan to staff the program, and what it will cost a student to have his car towed.

I have mixed feelings about their proposal to charge students less than Amherst Towing charges. On the one hand, towing should n ot become a cheap, painless procedure. The very fact that Amherst Towing charges more, and lies further away than a hypothetical student-run pound, provides a more drastic incentive not to park illegally; this is the only reason why the threat of towing exists. In New York City, a person will pay $90 to recover his car from New York's Finest; the severity of the penalty does a lot to discourage illegal parking and to declog some of the Midtown streets.

On the other hand, the promise of cheaper rates offers what heretofore has not existed, namely, a competitive — dare I say Capitalist? — advantage over Amherst Towing. People naturally want to patronize the organization which provides equivalent service at lower rates. While competition can only rebound in favor of the consumer, the question arises: why hasn't it existed before? After all, there are other towing concerns in the Amherst area. Why did they never bid for the UMass contract?

One sub-zero night a couple of winters ago when my car wouldn't start, I called one of these other garages to send a man over in a tow truck to help me start my car. After he arrived and we got to talking, I asked why his outfit or some other organization did not try to undercut Amherst Towing the next time the contract was to be renewed. He replied that no one else wanted to put up with the many hassles which the towing of students would cause. Since Amherst Towing was the only concern who was willing to bid — willing to put up with the aggravations — they could afford to place a higher bid than necessary to break even.

We the students bring Amherst Towing upon ourselves. We park illegally and criminally — not Amherst Towing. We bitch and moan when we get towed, poisoning relations between ourselves, the police, and Amherst Towing (And if you don't believe relations are poisoned, just call up Amherst Towing sometime, and tell the receptionist you're rom The Collegian. Judge for yourself how warmly they speak to you.) And ironically, by irrationally discouraging any competition to Amherst Towing, we pay Amherst Towing more for the same service anyone could give for less.

Finally, the people running the student towing campaign have admitted that they may have to train some of the student operators of towing equipment. Since towing sometimes damages cars, I would sooner have experienced professionals towing my car than student novices.

Divest South African investments

By C. PRIMEAU

> "The economic boycott of South Africa will entail undoubted hardship for Africans. We do not doubt that. But if it is a method which shortens the day of blood, the suffering to us will be a price we are willing to pay. In any case, we suffer already, our children are often undernourished, and, on a small scale (so far), we die at the whim of a policeman."

> president of the African > National Congress

A small white settler minority in South Africa maintains a dictatorship, posing as democracy, known as apartheid; the most severe form of racial discrimination and segregation enforced on the African people. Condemned by almost all members of the United Nations, and morally by the majority of people in the world, this system is able to continue solely because of the aid and support given to it by the western imperialist countries. Without American money pouring into South Africa in the form of investments, the dictatorship would soon collapse.

The U.S. government verbally deplores the apartheid system, but its actions are contradictory. Trade is increasing and investments are climbing. Presently, there are over 400 American corporations in South Africa, and UMass holds over $672,000 worth of stock in 16 of these corporations. UMass is supporting those corporations which are maintaining apartheid, and these corporations are not bettering the conditions for Blacks because the system is strategically designed to benefit the small white population only. With more economic power, the regime can achieve greater control and repression of the indigenous people.

There is nothing in the history of South Africa's economic development suggesting that increasing industrialization will lead to a higher quality of life for all of the people in South Africa. The

Here comes the sun

Little darling, it seems like years since it's been clear
Here comes the sun
Here comes the sun, and say, it's alright...

Into storage go the cords and jeans, the wool sweaters and hats, the down jackets, the leather boots. Out come the sneakers, sandals, cut-offs, bathing suits, halters, and T-shirts. No, I'm not writing another Collegion fashion special; I'm simply observing the changing of the seasons in Amherst, Massachusetts.

The first year I came home from UMass for the summer, the most frequently asked question was "Where do you go to school? California? Florida?" They laughed when I said UMass; somehow this state has gotten the reputation for snowstorms 365 days a year. Every spring since, I have joined my classmates and friends out on the lawn by the pond, next to the pool by the Fine Arts Center, or at "Brett Beach."

Spring and summer in Amherst are the most beautiful seasons up here; not since my freshman orientation has it rained much here in the spring (now that I say that, we will probably have 40 days and nights of continuous rain and cold weather).

My days in the spring have a definite set routine. Wake up early for classes and breakfast, and sit outside between classes to take advantage of the warm weather. After class I head up the hill, dodging frisbees and softballs to climb into shorts and whatever for playing in the afternoon sun. There are lacrosse, baseball, and softball games, frisbees galore, stereos, concerts, picnics, bicycling, and long walks at night; it's a virtual paradise.

Maybe I'm so attracted to the sun and the outdoors this time of year because I spent most of my life on Long Island, where the sun filters down through layers of smog and filth. When we moved to northern Connecticut, two things impressed me immediately. 1) for the first time, I smelled fresh air, and 2) I never knew there were so many stars in the sky. Amherst cannot compare with the top of a mountain on a crystal clear day, but it's a heck of a lot closer than the Long Island Expressway or Jericho Turnpike.

I've also noticed that spring seems to bring people together more easily; it's alot easier to meet people playing volleyball or sitting outside listening to music than to go down the hall and knock on a closed door. In the past, spring has brought increased activity and energy to student issues and concerns; however, it appears this may be one of our more quiescent years.

Spring at UMass is a time of sunburned shoulders, freckled noses, Noxema, band aids, and calloused feet. It's also a time of changes; some will transfer, some will stay all summer, some will go home for the summer and return in the fall. Others, like myself, will graduate. Next spring I'll be living in Boston, working indoors, and dreaming of climbing up to the Orchard and basking in the warm sun. Luckily for my studies, I've developed the fine art of reading outdoors and actually understanding what I've read. When the sun shines for the next three weeks, I'll catch you up at the hill.

System of checks and balances

I am not good friends with John Kenneth Galbraith. Nor with William Simon. More locally, I do not see eye to eye with Sam Bowles, mostly because I have never seen him or read his book or taken his course. Unfortunately, I have never taken an Economics course at this University. That, however, cannot hide from me the glaring fact that we do not spend our money in the right ways.

No, I'm not referring to what you choose to spend your money on. Go and blow your hard earned bread on iguana leather hip boots, damask bed canopies, Advent video beams, imported Japanese sake snifters, Nordic ski underwear and Nakamichi wallet size 16 track portable tape decks; that's fine with me and great for the economy.

What I take exception to is the current method of exchange.

In days long past, before the gold standard became standard, the rate of exchange was practical. A bushel of wheat equalled one piglet and nobody squawked. Likewise, three cows brought one slave, an eye for an eye or a tooth for a tooth was fair and one Romulus was good for one Remus, provided Caesar was rendered unto and got his rightful graft. As times changed, barter became less common and the curious symbolic thing known as yen in the Orient, moolah in the Middle East and money in the West grew to prominence. Supposedly, this "money" represented a secret stash reserve of the real stuff: gold and silver. From that point, everything became abstract, all the dollars, drachmae, denarii, shillings, sheckels, florins, francs, pounds, piasters and pazoozahs.

Naturally, the abstract trend has continued and grown to ridiculous proportions today. Everywhere you look, there is evidence of a society that is losing track of itself and its monetary system and substituting colored bits of paper that serve only to further divorce itself from the sense of an item's worth. And you do it everyday you write a check!

I work in a record store in Amherst and see the ebb and flow of the community's cash (on an increase right now due to tax returns). A typical scene is some Mt. Holyoke female or UMass flunkie picking up the latest Stevie Wonder, an older Joni Mitchell and a Capt. Beefheart or Sun Ra cutout, coming to the cash register and asking, "Can I write you a check?"

They proceed to make out their cute little sky blue check with fishing boats or birds or flowers printed on it to the tune of $13.80, then they enter the sum in their balance book, subtract from their previous balance and mumble something useless like, "I can't believe all the money I'm spending." What money? Those are little numerical figures, that's not really money. People who are in the habit of writing checks instead of paying cash soon forget the physical worth of money, its smelly, bulky, crumpled green presence.

The check is little more than an idea signifying money; cash is an icon that you can touch, throw, stuff into your mattress.

What relation does this bit of colored paper have to the filthy lucre, the happy cabbage? Very little say I. Think of it this way: pay for something with a check for $98.00, then pay for something with 98 single dollar bills. Which is harder to part with? Which seems like more money?

Checks are fine when you cash them at a bank and get cash in return, but they become dangerous when you begin to buy penny candy with them. When you write $10 on a check, you might as well write $20 for all it means to you at the time. Mastercharge and Bankamericard are even more absurd because you cannot even guess at your current balance. They are invitations to excess. My favorite consumer is one who pulls out a great wrinkled wad of green bills from his shirt pocket, peels off a few, adds a roll of nickels and makes up the difference with a pile of sweaty, greasy pennies. That is the person who is aware of his money's worth.

The latest and greatest degree of money abstraction has been reached with the introduction of federal food stamps. Some folks pay 3-4 their worth, some pay 1-3, some get them free. They are like money, but only where food is concerned and they look about as legitimate as Monopoly cash. And the change you get from a $1 foodstamp is a torn up scrap of paper with a number scrawled on it. Does money as we know it exist anymore? Where is it? Who has it? And what are they doing with it? The situation is precarious.

Fuck this. Bring back the Free Silver platform.

past 20 years of intensive economic growth have been years of intensifying oppression and exploitation of the Black people. Ninety-eight new discriminatory laws passed between 1961 and 1971; all intended to perpetuate white privilege and crush African protest movements. The government can jail anyone who opposes apartheid with the "Suppression of Communism Act". It calls any active opposition to South African racism a "communist subversion". Blacks have no vote. They cannot strike unionize or protest. With dozens of oppressive laws, the government has to resort to police state measures to crush the rising African opposition.

Black-white wage gaps have increased. The average white worker makes eight times as much as his or her African co-worker. In 1972, only three American corporations out of 350 involved in South Africa, were paying their African workers above the poverty datum line (about $[illegible]50 per month). Some American corporations paid as little as $40 per month to African workers. In 1974, the average wage of a South African man was $93 per month; well below the poverty datum line. So when we look at the corporate investments of over $1.5 billion in 1975 and increasing at a rate of about 20 per cent a year, we are looking at the results of apartheid: the availability of cheap Black labor.

Less than 20 per cent of the population (the whole settler populace) take home 76 per cent of the wealth. The indigenous 82 per cent are left with only 24 per cent of the wealth which they play the major part in producing.

Multi-national corporations, in response to anti-apartheid pressure, stress the advantages given to the Black people through their role in creating jobs. But this is not the case. South Africa is highly industrialized and new plants are sophisticated and automated. Black workers are being replaced by machines (thanks to I.B.M.), or more skilled white workers. For example: between 1962 and 1972 the total number of employees of the Caltex industry (a subsidiary of Texaco and Standard Oil of CA.), fell from 2400 to 1830. The proportion of Africans in the work force fell from 32 per cent to 22 per cent, while that of white employees rose from 56.5 per cent to 66 per cent. And they continue to boast of training programs and sometimes equal opportunity! This is why their profits are so high — for, if needed, a cheap labor source is available; otherwise with the aid of advanced(?) technology, imperialist powers and white S. Africa itself can exploit the African land alone. Here are some of the richest mineral deposits on earth. South Africa also yields 1-4 of the world's uranium (we know what this means to nuclear power advocates, for the U.S. has a limited supply of uranium) and about 75 per cent of the world's goal production outside of the Soviet Union.

How can these corporations claim they are benefitting, through trade, the black people of South Africa? Between 1960 and 1968, American private enterprise took $1.70 out of the economies of Africa for every $1.00 put in. Doesn't trade mean a comparable exchange?

Also, the governments and corporations of the imperialist countries are intertwined and are advocates of the government of South Africa, for that's where the profits lie. Between 1967 and 1972, the U.S. sold Bell Helicopters, Lear Jets, military transport planes, $22 million worth of communications equipment, including radar and electronic search and detection gear, and $10 million worth of herbicides and defoliants of the type used by American forces in Viet Nam to South Africa. The auto plants of General Motors, Chrysler and Ford have full scale, "dual purpose equipment" plants in South Africa that can be converted into military production plants whenever the government decides.

But now South Africa has its own industrialized economy and can produce most of these munitions itself. However, they lack one major necessity — oil. South Africa has no oil. Oil, the "lifeblood" of the army, navy and airforce is needed to mobilize vehicles, ships and planes. Mobil, Caltex, Shell and British Petroleum control 73 per cent of S. Africa's oil. This does not even include Superior Oil and Esso, both American corporations. Foreign investment is building the economy, making it better able to withstand any challenges. But who does the system now challenge, and therefore who will challenge it? In the words of a former South African Minister of "Defense": "Do not think we are arming to fight a foreign army. We are not. We are arming to shoot down the Black masses."

And of course, the U.S. sees the white regime as the first line of defense for the protection of its investments. For a profitable business, corporations require a constant level of stability and there are connections between corporations and the U.S. government that will undoubtedly move the U.S. government towards the maintainance of this stability. This is just what the South African regime needs, for the Black population aims to knock down the whole system as it now stands; for it stands on top of them. So, due to U.S. investments in South Africa, the U.S. corporative government is positioned against the Black people fighting for their freedom.

The U.S. is part of the South African regime through its investments, its military and political support, and through its function as principle international defender and promoter of imperialism. Our university supports apartheid. It is up to us to get UMass out! We must work in support of the African people by ending the imperialist interests of the U.S. in South Africa. Do our actions towards others correspond with the values of freedom and equality people the world over are struggling for, or will we continue to be an accomplice to facism? UMass, divest now!

Court upholds closing law

BOSTON [AP] — The Massachusetts Supreme Court upheld the state's Sunday closing laws yesterday in a case brought last winter by the Zayre Corp. department store chain.

Zayre openly challenged the laws by opening its stores in Agawam and Springfield on Nov. 28. Many other retailers joined in opening on several Sundays before Christmas.

Brewery tries new ad approach

WASHINGTON [AP] — The Adolph Coors Co., a Colorado brewery, took out a full page advertisement in a Washington newspaper yesterday asking: "Please don't buy our beer."

The reverse sales pitch said an Eastern beer lover might find Coors Beer flat or watery here.

"Truth be known, it often is," the ad said, going on to explain that much of the brew might be older than 60 days once it reaches Washington and that it might not have been refrigerated until sale.

O'Neill to can limousine

WASHINGTON [AP] — House Speaker Thomas P. "Tip" O'Neill says he may honor President Carter's appeal for energy conservation by getting rid of his own gas guzzler, a long, black limousine.

O'Neill told reporters yesterday he will instruct his aides to shop around for "a car of some other type that might serve the purpose."

Budget deficit is $46 billion

WASHINGTON [UPI] — The administration yesterday estimated the federal budget deficit this year will be $45 billion to $46 billion, nearly one third lower than President Carter projected two months ago.

Bert Lance, director of the Office of Management and Budget and a key Carter economic adviser, predicted the deficit for the fiscal year which ends Sept. 30.

Security recipients get increase

WASHINGTON [AP] — The nearly 38 million Americans who receive Social Security or Supplemental Security Income will get a 5.9 per cent increase in benefits starting July 1.

The size of the automatic increase, announced yesterday the Department of Health, Education and Welfare, reflects the rise in the cost of living during the 12 months that ended March 31.

N.H. motto causes controversy

CONCORD, N.H. [AP] — George and Maxine Maynard, who lost their jobs and spent time in jail over their right to tape over the state motto "Live Free or Die," say they still would like to live in New Hampshire.

The couple returned yesterday to the scene of their two-year battle after the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that New Hampshire can't make people display the motto on their auto plates.

"We were forced to go to another state, we lost our jobs, but it is still a beautiful place to live," Maynard said at a news conference called by the New Hampshire Civil Liberties Union.

He added that part of his objection to the motto came because he felt the state had infringed on his rights.

"In New Hampshire, I wasn't free and I didn't want to die for freedom," Maynard said.

Nuclear arms developing despite test ban talk

CA. (PNS) — While the Carter Administration repeatedly affirms its commitment to reversing the nuclear arms race, some of the nation's top nuclear weapons scientists here have charted a five-year development plan, based on Defense Department needs, calling for a substantial increase in nuclear weapons development.

The Lawrence Livermore Laboratory's nuclear weapons forecast could return weapons research and development levels to a pace near that of the early and mid-60's, when weapons in the current stockpile were being built.

In sharp contrast to its bucolic surroundings 40 miles east of San Francisco, the one-mile square laboratory complex is a high-security, deadly serious center of government-financed research in physics, chemistry and other applied sciences.

But its major responsibility, along with its sister institution at Los Alamos, N.M., is to conceptualize, design and develop the nuclear components of the nation's nuclear arsenal.

Laboratory administrators, sensitive to public criticsms of the weapons work, say that all weapons programs must be approved by the President and Congress.

But despite President Carter's hints of a unilateral nuclear test ban and his appointment of Paul Warnke, a liberal on arms control, to head the U.S. SALT delegation, morale among the nearly 3,400 scientists in the weapons program here is high.

They clearly were not displeased with the appointment of Harold Brown, a former lab director with an expert background in nuclear weapons research, to head the Defense Department. And they share open admiration for former Defense Secretary James Schlesinger, the new energy chief who will oversee the Energy Research and Development Administration (ERDA).

While the lab is actually managed through a contract with the University of California, it is financed through ERDA and the Department of Defense.

Besides friends in high places, the weapons scientists have other reasons for optimism about the future of their jobs.

The lab's fiscal 1977 nuclear weapons budget represents an 18 per cent increase over the previous year, reversing a decade-long trend of stagnation on nuclear weapons research. And if Defense Department plans for weapons development do not change significantly, the lab's "national security" budget will continue to grow in real dollars from $156 million in fiscal 1977 to $202 million in fiscal 1978.

(This portion of the budget includes funds for both weapons and laser fusion work, which has immediate applications to weapons testing.)

While this is a small part of the roughly $2.4 billion spent annually on nuclear weapons systems (not counting costs for missiles and bombers), many agree it is the most vital part. For it is here, and at Los Alamos, that the new ideas are developed that pave the way for the massive billion-dollar new weapons systems.

Right now, the picture for nuclear weapons scientists is probably better than at any time in the past decade. The lab's current nuclear weapons forecast through 1982, based on 1976 projected needs, and subject to periodic review, calls for more money, more manpower, more facilities and more weapons.

What's Happening

EPA official speaks on Seabrook license

The operating license for the nuclear power plant at Seabrook, New Hampshire is being withheld by the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) pending a final decision by its new administrator.

EPA's regional office has objected to the design of the plant's cooling system, saying it will have a deleterious effect on the environment of the Seabrook area.

Robert Thompson EPA's regional counsel, will speak on the current status of the license tonight at 7:30 in Thompson 102 and he will also speak on the reasoning behind EPA's decision.

Motorcycle co-op meeting Thursday

The UMass Motorcycle Co-op got off to a late start this semester, holding its first meeting only last Thursday evening. Officers were elected and plans were discussed for establishing a local workshop as well as ordering parts at a discount.

The officers of the co-op are: President, Charles K. Guerard II, Vice-President, Francis Malfa, Treasurer, Nicolas Elliot, and Secretary, John Cuzzone.

The Co-op will have a table on the Campus Concourse next week and a meeting Thursday at 7 p.m. in the Campus Center. All interested people are invited to attend.

Frisbee tournament to be held tomorrow

The UMass Frisbee Club invites you to enter the first Annual Amherst Area Frisbee Tournament to be held rain, wind or shine tomorrow. Registration will take place between 9:30 - 10 a.m. at the Southwest Athletic Fields near the barbecue pits. Cost is a dollar.

Men and women will compete in the same events but not against each other. Prizes will be awarded to the best men and women in each event.

The purpose of this tournament is to expose all to the standard International Frisbee Tournament events so come down, learn and, above all, have fun. Bring your own everything and that includes discs.

WHAT'S HAPPENING

Career conference at Mount Holyoke

The Five College International Career Conference takes place tomorrow at Gamble Auditorium, Mount Holyoke College. The program runs from 9:30 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. There is not admission charge. There will be guest panelists from Foreign Service, the United Nations, the Ford Foundation, and other organizations and firms.

'Balcou' scenes showing at Amherst

Some scenes of the French play, "Balcou" will be shown today and tomorrow at 8 p.m. in Coverage Assembly Room, Amherst College. "Balcou" is written by Jean Genet, a great French playwright. The presentation is directed by Roseline Reynaud. For further information, call 542-3807 or 542-2317.

Annual Greek week beginning tomorrow

Greek Week 1977 begins tomorrow. This is a tradition where all the fraternities and sororities on campus sponsor many enjoyable events, profits of which are donated to charity. The combination of Sigma Kappa and Kappa Alpha Theta sororities, along with Pi Lambda Phi and Sigma Alpha Epsilon fraternities are sponsoring a "Gong Show" at the Pub, Tuesday at 7:30 p.m. First prize is a $20 gift certificate at the Pub and a trophy. There will be free beer for all entries.

Admission is 25 cents at the door, and Happy Hour beer prices will be in effect. All money raised will go to the Muscular Dystrophy Foundation.

Health Services summer coverage

University Health Services will again offer prepaid health services to students and their dependents who will be in the Amherst area during the coming summer.

This includes students and their dependents from the Five College area. The same comprehensive package of services will be offered as during the academic year. The prepaid package of services covers the period from May 24 through August 30. The deadline for enrollment for coverage for the entire summer is June 15. The fee is $35 for students and an additional $35 for their dependents.

Students who are enrolled in the summer session and pay a health fee as part of their service fees can pay an additional amount to obtain coverage for the entire summer period. Care will also be available on a fee-for-service basis.

Questions regarding the Summer Health Plan can be answered by the University Health Services business office 549-2671, ext. 170.

Long season rewards riders

Equestrians attend Regionals

By SUSAN SCANLON
Collegian Staff

For 14 members of the UMass Equestrian Team, the long, hard show season has paid off. This weekend, they will attend the Regional Championships, which are hosted by Worcester State College.

The Regionals not only allow a rider to win a regional title, but also the chance to go to the National Championships next weekend at the University of Virginia. Only the top four riders pinned in each division at the Regionals will be allowed to go to the Nationals.

Last year, five UMass riders qualified for the Nationals. Coach Sarah Carlson feels, "this year we will be sending many more riders to the Nationals because we are amuch stronger and much more confident team than last year."

It has been a long year for the UMass Equestrian Team. Horse shows began early last fall, and continued all winter and right through the spring months. Asked if team members were beginning to tire at this point, Carlson said that, "riding is a year-round sport. The only time a rider gets tired or lazy, is when he is not riding. Right now the team is excited and anxious to ride in the Regionals."

The many hours did pay off for the UMET this year, as it has clinched a solid third place finish for the overall team points in the Region. The UMET did have hope of regaining its National title as a team, but as it did not, Carlson believes that there is "a lot of individual talent that will stand out at both the Regional and National Championships."

The qualifying riders for the Regionals in the Advanced Division are Nancy Farnsworth, Sandy Most, Whitney Buttrick, Susan Scanlon, Ann Van Heerdan, Linda Roberts, Robin Ziegler, and Sharon Scraggs. In the Intermediate and Beginner Divisions are Barry Grolman, Pam Johnson, Pat Zinkowski, Donna Oulette, Norine Spanos, and Michele Fedele.

The Regionals will be held at Saddle River Farm in Sterling, Mass. For directions call Tillson Farm at 545-0260. The best collegiate riders from the New England area will be competing in this event; all are urged to come and enjoy this day of fine, equestrian sport.

Sports in Brief

BOSTON [UPI] — The referees should be in for another long night Friday when push comes to shove in the third game of the NBA playoff bout between the Boston Celtics and Philadelphia 76ers.

"We've got to bang the boards," said 76ers forward George McGinnis after Philadelphia had leveled the Celtics, 113-101, Wednesday at the Spectrum. "This has been a very physical series. There's a lot more pushing and shoving.

"The refs are not used to these players. With most (referees), you know how they're going to call a ballgame."

The playoff games figured to be more unruly because of the NBA referees' strike that has put 24 of the 26 officials on the sidelines. But Boston's beef in Wednesday night's game was with Richie Powers, one of two veterans who is ignoring the strike.

"I can't stomach Powers anymore. He's the senior official and should have done a better job," said Boston Coach Tom Heinsohn, who was ejected late in the second half Wednesday after Powers assessed him two technical fouls.

Of course, Heinsohn's team lost, which shaded his view of the game. Winning Coach Gene Shue "didn't think the game was all that rough."

PHILADELPHIA [UPI] — The attorney representing striking National Basketball Association referees charged yesterday that the league refused to agree to attend a meeting arranged to mediate the dispute.

Richard G. Phillips said the National Association of Basketball Referees, representing 24 of the 26 league referees, requested that the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service step in to resolve the strike, which began April 10.

"The NBA has refused to attend such a meeting," Phillips said. "It's another effort on the league's part to frustrate meaningful dialogue and NABR's attempt to bring about an end to the labor dispute between the NBA and the NABR."

During the strike, the NBA has hired substitute referees to officiate in playoff games, teaming them if possible with regular officials Richie Powers and Earl Strom. The striking referees have been picketing game sites.

LAS VEGAS [UPI] — An agent for Jerry Tarkanian has begun salary negotiations with the Seattle Supersonics, who still have a year left on Bill Russell's contract as coach and general manager.

Tarkanian, basketball coach at the University of Nevada—Las Vegas, has met with Sonic officials about replacing Russell.

He said he had "exploratory conversations" with Sonic owner Sam Schulman and the team's executive vice president, Zollie Volchok. Schulman also has been talking with Russell about the former pro star's future with the team.

Tarkanian said Vic Weiss, a Long Beach, Calif., auto dealer and close friend who negotiates for him, has begun money talks with the Seattle officials.

"He (Schulman) hasn't told me that. That's what Vic told me. Their position is much stronger financially than the Lakers. I'm not saying how much, just more."

Tarkanian's salary at UNLV is reported at $34,000, although benefits are believed to elevate his income to about $75,000 a year. Russell makes about $250,000 annually for his dual job with the Sonics.

NEW YORK [UPI] — Karen Logan, a gifted all-around athlete who excels in basketball, has been signed by the newly-formed Women's Basketball Association, which plans to start its first season in the late fall of 1977.

Logan, a 5'9" 27-year-old, is best known for defeating Jerry West in a basketball shooting contest as part of the Challenge of the Sexes series.

Logan's contract calls for a guaranteed salary above the league minimum of $10,000 for the 62-game, six-month season. She also will benefit from the "Partners in Profit" clause, which stipulates each player will receive an annual salary increase based on the increase in yearly attendance.

Logan attended Pepperdine University on a track scholarship. "Basketball scholarships weren't available when I went to college," she explained.

But she played basketball on her own every day, often against men. The coach at Pepperdine was so impressed with her he suggested she try out for the Red Heads, a touring women's basketball team.

"I made the team pretty easily and was the team's show dribbler," said Logan.

She played with the Red Heads for three years, traveling up to 60,000 miles a year to appear in a 200-game season. "The salary wasn't enough to take me through the off-season," she said.

Your Birthday by Stella Wilder

Friday, April 22 — Born today, you are a highly intelligent individual who is perhaps more creative than either instinct or reason can satisfactorily handle. There are times when your ideas of how you will best accomplish your goals are so "far out" as far as the person of ordinary talents is concerned that is is impossible for you to gain the kind of support and cooperation you need to bring those ideas to fruition as projects and profits. On the other hand, when you are engaged in activities utilizing ordinary means to accomplish mundane ends, you not only find that you have little to contribute, what you do contribute is quite unwelcome. You will have to make up your mind how dear integrity is to you and act accordingly.

One who trusts others to do their best both by you and by themselves, you find it difficult to accept deception or disservice of any kind as behavior that can be excused even by virtue of extenuating circumstances. You are bound by nature to suffer considerable pain during your lifetime where your personal relationships are concerned, for you will generally find that you give more than you get, hope for more than others can possibly give, and so on. Even so, you will not give up your trusting, optimistic ways; rather, you will always act upon trusting, optimistic lines -- and let the devil take the hindmost.

There is much of the romantic about you. You know how to act in a practical, entirely rational way, but you do not necessary like it. Deeply emotional, you respond even to the slightest nuance of meaning. You will learn, however, as maturity overtakes the child in you, to keep your emotion out of your face. You will learn to cry inwardly even as you laughingly tell jokes and funny stories. You need only take care that the concealing of feeling does not lead to the extinguishing of feeling.

Saturday, April 23

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) — Idealistic thinking may lead you into error this morning. You may have more than one interesting experience in the process of making corrections.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) — Your financial problems are your own. Recognize this and you stand a better chance of solving your difficulties by day's end.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) — The mystery you feel in the air early in the day is solved by day's end. Don't delay passing on information to those in authority.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) — Whatever occurs in nature without man's help may cause you problems today as you attempt to understand the process. Deliver on a promise.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) — All opposition to your plans for advancement should be removed today. Thank those responsible for your forward movement.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) — Plans made early in the day may need rather drastic revision by day's end. Don't hesitate to remake, reshape and reactivate.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) — It is impossible for you to take in all that will occur in the way of opportunity. Make up your mind as to a direction -- and stick to it.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) — Although you must give some weight to another's opinion of your work, don't trust it completely. You know your own likes and dislikes.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) — Time lies heavy on your hands today, but not so heavy that you are unable to make progress in the long [illegible]. Reschedule events.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) — Although you may seem unable to handle all the demands made upon you today [illegible] surprise even yourself by [illegible] end. Move quickly.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) — Your point of view is [illegible] that is no reason to attempt to force it upon another. Keep an open mind and heart.

ARIES (March 21-April 19) — Friends and family provide all the impetus you need for progress at this time. Dreams may come true late in the afternoon.

Letter to the Editor

To the Sports Editor:

After reading Nick Kotsopoulos' column [4-13] concerning Bill Campbell and his free agent counterparts, I can't help feeling his wrath is somewhat misdirected. An athlete makes an easy target, but the real villains are being left completely out of the picture.

Today's ballplayers are indeed being paid ridiculously high salaries. The fans are also getting stuck with the bill. Still, I find it hard to fault a guy for trying to et everything he can in a business where the average career is between five to seven years and then only in periods of six months annually. In addition, players spend much time on the road and often are unequipped to earn a living after they leave the game. The name of the game is indeed security. Granted, some players are what Kotsopoulos termed "big babies" and they do ask for much more than they are worth, but they are the driving force behind what has evolved into a multi-million dollar business.

That is where the blame lies. Charlie Finley, Calvin Griffith and George Steinbrenner are not in baseball out of a love for the game. Nor are the rest of the owners. Those days have been left far behind. Now, the game is controlled as much by profit margins and tax shelters as it is by solid hitting and good defense. They hired free agents because it is these alleged superstars that bring people to the ballparks. The Phillies have estimated that they need to draw 2.2 million fans this season in order to break even. Then, why shouldn't they shell out 150 grand for Richie Hebner? It's a minor investment in a major business. Simply, baseball is no longer a game and largely, it is the fault of the owners. After all, it was Charlie Finley who tried to screw Catfish Hunter out of his contract and laid the reserve clause open to subsequent challenges. Then, he became the vehement opponent of free agent status and in true style, proceeded to draft negotiation rights to every free agent. It's all business for Charlie O.

So, before we condemn the free agents because they fail to bat 1.000 or win 50 games, let's remember that while they asked for the salaries, the owners gave it to them. Realistically, the free agents could be paid without raising ticket and concession prices, but unfortunately, money has replaced baseball as the Great American Pastime.

Bosox up for sale; DiMaggio may buy

BOSTON (UPI) — The Boston Red Sox, the sole property of the late Thomas A. Yawkey for 43 years, are up for sale by the trust that now runs the ball club, it was announced yesterday.

General manager Dick O'Connell read a statement from Mrs. Yawkey, who has headed the trust since her husband's death last July, that said in part:

"Consideration will be given to offers to buy the Red Sox. Offers are not being sought; nor will they be sought. A time limit is not in mind; nor will one be fixed."

The announcement came minutes after the Red Sox had dropped an 8-0 decision to the Detroit Tigers.

O'Connell said no serious offers have been received although several parties have inquired into purchase of the Red Sox over the past year.

"As far as any serious offers being made, I would say no," said O'Connell, who denied that he would be interested in joining a group to purchase the club. "We've had inquiries from certain people but these people have never seen our books. They don't know anything about the income or the expenditures of this club."

One group long rumored interested in buying the Red Sox is headed by former Boston outfielder Dom DiMaggio. Now a business executive in the greater Boston area, DiMaggio has said, "I am interested in buying this club if and when the Yawkeys ever decide to sell it."

Sports notice

Eliot Asinof will speak on the Black Sox scandal of 1919 at Herter Hall 231, 12:20 p.m. on Monday, April 25.

Asinof, who played minor league baseball for three years in the Philadelphia Phillies farm system, is the author of Eight Men Out, the only book ever written dealing with the infamous world series fix.

In 1919, eight members of the pennant winning Chicago White Sox team conspired with gamblers to throw the world series. The scandal episode and its implications are the focus for a UMass history course. Asinof will address the students in this course, and interested University and Five College "fans" are cordially invited.

Ruggers face brawl

By RICHARD MOORE
Collegian Staff

The UMass rugby football club A, B and C sides travel to New York Saturday and face a stern test in a 1:00 match against the Schenectady Rugby Club.

The Minutemen, practically unbeatable when they play college sides, expect a tough battle against the Schenectady club, which beat the UMass A side 10-7 last year.

"We'll be in for a close match," UMass coach "Doc" Laurence said, "because they are a club side and will have more experienced players than a cllege side."

Laurence has been working his squad hard all week, trying to refine their ball handling and passing.

"The ball handling and transfers are getting better," Laurence said, "especially on the B side."

"We're playing well enough now to beat Schenectady," he added.

Laurence plans to juggle the A side line up a little, with Jack Richman moving up from the B's to play hooker and front row man Ed McCabe will go to prop. The A's will also be bolstered by the return of second row player Mike Malone.

Laurence said he is looking for a UMass B side win, as the B's have been working hard all week and have looked good in practice.

Stan Luboda, center who played a fine game on a makeshift UMass side that beat Springfield 24-0 last week, will make the move up to either the C or B side.

The B side needs to start winning more line out ball, something they did very little of in last weeks 18-6 loss to the University of Vermont.

"Winning line out ball is important to a team that is trying to establish ball control," Laurence said.

"We are a running team, we like to play keep away with the ball," Laurence added, "but we've got to get the ball before we control it.

The kicking of Hugh Chester-Jones for the A side and Andy Middleton for the B's gives the Minutemen a big edge in any close game.

The C side also has a good toe in wing Eddie Bender, who set two penality kicks were the margin of victory (6-3) against Vermont.

"Our kicking definitely makes us a threat in a tight contest," Laurence said, "and I'm expecting some real tight games this weekend.

Women's golf team takes on Holyoke

By JUDY VAN HANDLE
Collegian Staff

The UMass women's golf team will be playing its second match of the season today at 1:00 as it takes on Mt. Holyoke at Hickory Ridge.

The Minutewomen began their season last Friday with a match against Mt. Holyoke, and wound up losing by 18 strokes.

UMass' number one player, Deb McCulloch, was tied for low honors as she and Mt. Holyoke's Jan Van Munching each shot 85's.

"Debbie should be shooting in the 70's and the rest of the girsl should be in the 80's," said UMass coach Jane McGahan, an assistant pro at Hickory Ridge.

The team was originally slated to meet Rhode Island tomorrow at Hickory Ridge, but was forced to cancel the match as the Rams do not have enough golfers to field a full squad this spring.

"At lot of schools find it easier to play in the fall rather than the spring," McGahan explained. "The weather is against us usually, since it's often muddy from spring rains."

UMass will meet Mt. Holyoke again next Friday at Hickory Ridge, and hopefully will have another match against the South Hadley college later this spring.

McGahan is optimistic about the Minutewomen's chances for success in today's match.

"The girls have been playing pretty good in their practice rounds," she said. "Hopefully they can do better in this match."

She singled out McCulloch and senior Joanne Smith as having particularly impressive practice rounds this week.

McGahan said that the Minutewomen are priming themselves for a good showing in the Lady Lion Invitational, to be held at Penn State two weekends from now.

"I'm hoping that the team can do real well there," she said. "Penn State always has a good team, since they have a golf scholarship program."

Few New England schools field women's golf teams. Aside from UMass, Mt. Holyoke, and Rhode Island, Boston College and Wheaton College are the only other schools to have squads.

Other members of the UMass team this spring are Elisa Romano, Joy Little, Meg Groden, and Anne Morrison.

only trail by two at 5-3. Bob Alves walked and was sent to third on a Charlie Ciccone double to left center. Shortstop and co-captain Jim Cullen lined a homerun to left and the momentum seemed to switch the other way.

Tewhill retired the side in the seventh but was hit hard in the eighth. Stag third baseman Brendon Vane, who earlier hit a homerun, doubled off the centerfield wall and advanced to third on a single to left. Tewhill got the next two men out but gave up a 335' gopher ball to Diotalevi and school was out for the diamondmen 8-3.

"In order for Tewhill to be sharp, he has to have pin-point control and keep the ball down. He just didn't have it today," said a disappointed Bergquist.

The diamondmen will have today off to heal their wounds before tackling the second team in New England — Maine — tomorrow at 1:00 at Lorden Field.

Trackmen prepare for BC Relays

By DAVE RODMAN
Collegian Staff

The UMass men's track team will be in action this weekend in the three day Boston College Relays.

"We'll be using this meet mainly as a stepping stone towards the Penn Relays next week," said coach Arnie Morse. "We'll be looking for continued improvement in people's racing."

In the 440 intermediate hurdles, John Richards and Mark Healy will be attempting to qualify for the IC4A's. This will also be the goal of several and of the other relays as well as most of the other individuals.

The meet will feature rematches in both the mile and two mile relays. More specifically, it will be UMass and host BC going head to head in two relays in which the Eagles just nosed out UMass in last week's UMass relays.

The two mile relay will have Joe Martens, Steve MacDougall, Jeff King and Jim Hunt. The mile relay will go with Healy, Richards, Martens, and a runner to be named later.

The strongest relay after that will probably be the distance medley. Bob Martin will run the half, Francis O'Keefe the 440, Frank Carroll the three quarter mile, and Mike Quinn the mile.

Lou Panaccione, Rick Walls, Cliff Staples, and Bob Neil all have a good chance of placing in the 6 mile. Tom and Matt Wolff, Mike Morris, and Neil McGrail will be in the three mile.

The field events will also be represented in both relays and individually. Pete Saravis, Bob Hastings, and Mark Galusza will throw the javelin. Kan Adamson, Ron Williams, and Toney Pendleton will compete in the long jump relay. Field event relays are won by the total height or distance of all three competitors.

Individual field events will have Teddy Power in the pole vault, R Williams in the high jump and triole jump, Bob Fitgzerals in the high jump, Ron Melkonian in the discus and shot put.

UMass will also have four men in the grueling two day, ten ecent decathlon. Brady Mayer, Bruce Parsons, Buddy Hackett, and Andy Janiak will compete for UMass.

Like most relay meets, this one will be a chance to hone competitive skills under slightly less pressured than in a dual or regular championship meet. UMass, as Morse stressed, will be using this meet mainly to sharpen up for the more prestigious Penn Relays, held next week in Philadelphia.

...while women host pair of opponents

By DAVE RODMAN
Collegian Staff

The women's track season will roll along tomorrow when Central Connecticut State College and Boston University invade the Llewelyn Derby Track at 1:00 p.m.

The Minutewomen had one "meet" since last Saturday's UMass Relays. On Tuesday the women traveled to Storrs, Connecticut to make up a meet with UConn. When they arrived, the women found the University of Rhode Island officially scheduled for that meet, was totally against their competing.

The UMass women, though a little discouraged by the unusual turn of events, managed to handily come out on top in the unofficial point totals. They will bring pretty much the same lineup into the meet on Saturday.

On Tuesday, the relays were unbeatable, as both the 440 and sprint medley relays took first places. Diane Sealy, Cindi Martin, Kathy Contini, and Nancy Cominoli combined for a time of 51.8 in the 440 relay.

The sprints and hurdles continued to be a strong suit for the women. Chris Perron won the 100-meter high hurdles in 15.8 seconds, with Cominoli third. In the 100 meters, Cominoli tied for first in 13.6 seconds, with Martin in fourth and Perron in fifth.

The middle and long distances are pretty consistent when it comes to the UMass women — consistent point producers. Sealy won the 440 with a time of 59.3, with Carolyn Shea second. Bonnie Bukowski and Sue Mulligan were second and third, respectively, in the 880.

Barbara Callanan led a sweep of the first three places in the mile run. Johara Chapman was second, Maggie Crowley third, and Debbie Farmer was fifth. In the two-mile, Jane Welzel motored to an easy win. Monica Scott was third.

Although the field events have been a weak point for the women so far this spring, Sue Budzynkiewicz took a first in the discus with a toss of 97'7". Gail Emond was third in the javelin at 115'3".

With a return to an excellent facility, Derby track, the women should turn out some times more impressive than those recorded at UConn, which is an inferior track facility.

Tennis team faces Central Conn, BC

By MIKE SMOLENS
Collegian Staff

The UMass men's tennis team will have its hands full this weekend with back-to-back home matches against Central Connecticut tomorrow and a very hot Boston College team on Sunday.

The two weekend matches could have drastic effects on UMass' record. By winning both, the Minutemen, now 3-1, would have an invincible 5-1 record going into their last two matches against SUNY Albany and Springfield next week. However, if UMass loses the two matches, the Minutemen would be fighting to finish the season above .500.

The Central Connecticut match shouldn't be much more than a good warm-up for the Minutemen's match against BC on Sunday. Last year, UMass defeated Central Connecticut 7-2, however, "it took everything we had to beat them," UMass coach Bill Brown said.

The BC match will be a horse of a different color, no doubt about it. The Eagles are flying high. Already they have a season record of 5-1, which includes a devastating upset over Harvard, perhaps the top tennis school in New England, and a near miss against Tufts earlier this week.

Tufts outclassed UMass in doubles two weeks ago and won the match 6-3, handing the Minutemen their only defeat.

The Eagles' strength is their middle singles, contrasting UMass, where the power lies in the first two singles players, Adam Rosen and Alan Green.

"They're (BC) equal all the way down line in singles," Brown said. "We're going to have to win three, four, five and six (in singles). They're the ones that are going to determine the match."

The Minutemen are strong at the top, but are far from weak in the lower singles lineup. Jimmy Barnhart and Alan Staple, UMass' fifth and sixth singles players, have lost only once this season. Barnaby Kalan, at third singles, is 2-2.

Fourth singles player Ricky Sharton, 1-3 on the season, is the only Minuteman with a losing record. Both Rosen and Green are undefeated.

Although Brown claims the singles will decide the BC match, the doubles competition will be the key to success. Last fall and so far this spring, UMass hasn't won or lost a match in the singles against a team of BC's caliber. The Minutemen, at worst, have tied in singles. Their fate against a tough opponent has always been determined in doubles.

Brown's main concern, however, was not BC's talent, but the weekend forecast.

"The only thing I'm worried about is the weather," he said.

Duffers breeze past field

UMass' Mark Powers canned a hole-in-one en route to firing an impressive two-over-par 74, pacing the Minutemen to a decisive 14 stroke victory over Boston College at the Hickory Ridge Country Club in Amherst yesterday afternoon.

The Holy Cross golfers never really got untracked as they carried up the rear with a 433 stroke total. UMass had 391 swings compared to the Eagles' 405 pokes.

Powers smacked a four wood into the teeth of a gale on the 222-yard fifth hole, and was rewarded with the niftiest eagle of his golf career. It sure saves wear and tear on his putter.

Boston College's number one player, Danny Curtis, was two-under-par after 12 holes, but his deliberate style of play failed him in the final holes as he collected three bogies to finish at one-over-par 73.

UMass freshman Flint Lincoln found some weird places to hit golf shots, but showed some heady scrambling abilities while finishing with an erratic 77. His score was matched by teammate and reigning New England champion Jim McDermott, who played tenaciously despite some inconsistent play.

Other performers for the Minutemen were Mark Duggan (81) and "Elfy" Sanderson (82). All players felt that the wind was a factor in the quality of play.

"It was very windy for about two hours of the round," said UMass coach Fan Gaudette after the match, "but it finally calmed down a bit towards the end. When it was blowing, though, it was real tough."

The 6876-yard layout proved to be much more difficult than expected, as the wind whipped indecisively back and forth for much of the contest. The faces of some of the finishers were longer than the par five holes.

Gaudette hopes that Powers' fine play means that the coach's search for a consistent fourth man is over. According to the coach, Powers is capable of top-flight golf, and only needs some consistency in order to fulfill his potential.

"Powers has played real well this year," Gaudette said, "Nearly all his cards for this season have been below 80. He'll definitely be playing for us this weekend in the Salem State tourney. I'm not really sure how the rest of the team will shape up. This will be a best four out of five setup, so the question of a fourth man is especially important."

Because of the brevity of the spring golf season, it is going to be difficult for Gaudette to decide who he is going to go with in the all-important New England championships on May 5-6.

The Salem State Invitational will be held on Sunday and Monday, April 24-25, at the Essex Country Club in Manchester, Mass. Sunday will be a shotgun start beginning at about 12:30, and Monday is expected to feature an early start, probably about 8:00 or 8:30 in the A.M.

Bosox bombed by Tigers bats

BOSTON (UPI) — Rookie right hander Dave Rozema threw a four-hitter for his first major league win and Jason Thompson drove home four runs yesterday in boosting the Detroit Tigers to an 8-0 victory over the Boston Red Sox.

The 20-year-old Resema, making the jump from AA ball, struck out four batters and walked no one in his third start while not allowing a runner past second.

Thompson rocketed his third homer of the season, a solo drive into the centerfield bleachers in the fourth inning. He singled in another run in the sixth and drove in two more runs with a single in the seventh.

Rookie left fielder Steve Kemp drove in the first and winning run in the second inning with a single to center after Ben Oglivie had singled.

Mickey Stanley added a two-run homer in the seventh inning which knocked out loser Reggie Cleveland, now 1-1, and Aurelio Rodriguez added a solo homer in the eighth for the Tigers.

Gorillas take on Ephmen; shooting for sixth straight

By BILL EDELSTEIN
Collegian Staff

Just about the nicest thing you can say about the Williams College lacrosse team is that it's a good College Division club...and UMass lacrosse coach Dick Garber says the nicest things.

Garber's Gorillas can be expected to handle the Ephmen easily, as they have in the teams' previous two encounters (22-11 last year) when they meet each other in Williamstown, tomorrow at 2:00 p.m.

The Ephmen have a very disciplined team with good stickhandlers. Midfield Todd Eckerson, was a high school all-American.

"We've beaten Williams badly when we've pressed them full-court, and that's what we have planned for tomorrow," forecasted Garber. "We'll wait for mistakes and try to get our fast break going."

The UMass Hospital Corps could provide a breather for the opposition. Not only will defenseman Rich Donovan sit out his second contest owing to a sprained ankle, but top scorer Jeff Spooner pulled a leg muscle in practice and he, too, could be sidelined tomorrow.

The doctors also have some good news, though, as midfielder Toby Rice will be back in uniform after a prolonged stay of absence.

"Toby will play with Terry Keefe and Mike Lewis, which should give us three pretty strong lines," said the UMass coach.

Both Donovan and Spooner are expected to be healthy for North Carolina, however, and this, coupled with Rice's return to create the third line, will afford the Gorillas the depth they need to survive the four teams in eight days that lie in wait for them after the Williams contest.

None of those games will give UMass an opportunity to watch the flowers bloom, as along with the Tarheels, the Gorrillas catch New Hampshire (5-1, third in New England), Syracuse and Harvard (second in New England) — all top 20 teams.

"It won't be easy," said Garber, "but I think we can go undefeated though the rest of the season. In fact, it looks to me like we'll have to if we expect to make the playoffs." UMass was the ninth-ranked lacrosse team in the nation as of the latest coaches poll, and only the top eight clubs see post-season action.

RUNNING OUT OF THINGS TO SAY — Garber is pleased with Norm Smith's play at starting midfield. "Norm gives us some quickness and gets us running; he s an exciting player." ... The May 7 game at Harvard looks like it will determine this year's New England Champion.

UMass outclasses Chiefs

By PAT McGRATH
Collegian Staff

SPRINGFIELD — Classy. That is the only way to describe the 1977 version of the UMass softball team.

The undefeated Minutewomen rolled to their seventh straight win yesterday by edging out a surprised Springfield team, 7-6. The victory equals the most games that UMass has won in three years.

The Chiefs of Springfield came out of the gate fast as they ran to a quick 4-0 lead in the opening frame. The UMass defense was shaky, as Springfield represented the toughest team that the softballers had had to contend with.

"Playing Springfield is more than just a game," commented senior co-captain Heidi Dickson. "There is another factor involved besides talent — and that is the psychological effects of a team like Springfield. Once we settled down, I knew we could play the type of game that we're capable of — and we did!"

Settle down indeed is what UMass did. In the second inning, leftfielder Sue Peters made a nice catch of a long fly ball and doubled up the runner who had left second. In the next frame, shortstop Sue DiRocco put down the side all by herself with three good defensive plays.

Things finally fell into place for the Minutewomen in the top of the fourth inning. With one out, Peters got the first hit off of the tough Chief pitcher Carol Johnson with a sharp infield single. Senior Gail Matthews followed with a grounder that should have been an out, but the Chiefs' first basemen had her foot off of the bag, which put runners on first and second.

Freshman Rhonda McManus then belted a triple to center, scoring Peters and Matthews. The UMass bats continued to explode as Pat Oski's bloop single to left brought McManus home. Dickson walked and Cheryl Meliones laid down a nice bunt to load up the bases. Freshman Chris Verdini then proceeded to single to left to score two more UMass runs. The score at the end of four was 6-4 in favor of UMass.

Springfield came back in the fifth inning to score two unearned runs. The Chiefs had one walk and two singles, but two UMass errors brought in the two Springfield runs.

The Minutewomen came up for their last time in the top of the seventh with a six to six tie staring them in the face. With one out, Verdini stroked another key single and advanced to second on a fielder's choice. DiRocco followed with a single that scored Verdini with the winning run.

"I took a chance waving Verdini home," said UMass coach Dianne Thompson. "Chris has been hampered by a knee injury, and her baserunning hasn't been up to par. You've got to take chances though, especially against a team like Springfield. It really paid off!"

UMass played solid defense in the bottom of the seventh to preserve the victory. DiRocco made two more good plays, and Verdini ended the game with a super catch of a tough foul pop.

"It's a good sign to see a young club like this be down by four runs in the first inning and be able to win it. It was a total team effort with the bench lending a lot of support. It was great!" summarized an elated Thompson.

A big factor for the Minutewomen was the pitching of freshman Gail Carter. She came in to relieve starter Gail Matthews, who had been tagged for eight hits, in the fifth inning. With one out and the bases loaded, Carter made a good defensive play when she faked a throw to second and caught the runner who was in between second and third. Carter didn't allow a hit, run, or walk in two and two-thirds innings.

"I had confidence in myself and the team and we went out there and did it!" related the winning pitcher.

Offensive standouts for the Minutewomen were Verdini with two singles and two RBI's, McManus' two-run scoring triple, and DiRocco's game winner. Perhaps the most important hit of the game was the very first one by Peters, which finally got the momentum going for the Minutewomen.

UMass will travel to the University of Connecticut tomorrow for an 11:00 game. UConn has lost two games, and one was against the same Westfield team that the Minutewomen bombed.

"We'll have good momentum going into that game," related Thompson. "It should be a really good game for us."

Gazelles gather second triumph

By JIM GLEASON
Collegian Staff

The UMass women's lacrosse team rolled to its second straight win of the young season yesterday as it defeated Williams College, 13-3, in a home game.

The Gazelle's dominated play right from the start but led only 5-1 at halftime, mainly on the strength of Julie Hall's two goals.

"We missed a lot of opportunities in the first half," said UMass Coach Frank Garahan, "but that happens in any game. I was extremely pleased that we stuck with it and didn't get discouraged."

In the second half, the Gazelles started to click as they outscored the Ephwomen, 8-2. Nancy O'Neil netted four goals in the half as they blew the game wide open.

Garahan said that the strategy for UMass against Williams was to get the ground balls and control play. They were very successful as they dominated play throughout the game and limited Williams' opportunities on offense.

"We did a great job forechecking in their zone and we rode them well all over the field. This kind of defense led to many intercepted passes and ground balls which is what we wanted."

Goalie Mary Murray played "a real fine game" in the net for the Gazelles. She was counted on to make many fine saves when Williams had a break. "This game should help her to regain her confidence because she's had a rough start," said Garahan.

The scoring for UMass started off like an old story as Hall (2 goals, 2 assists), the team's leading scorer, tallied the first two goals. From there, O'Neil took over, scoring five goals and adding two assists. Evie Sneeden totaled three goals and two assists and Cindy Hartstone added two goals.

Judy Kennedy and Lisa Methfessel also drew assists.

"Anyone on our offense has the talent to score five goals a game when we play well. Last game it was Julie (Hall) and this game it was Nancy (O'Neil). Saturday could be some body else."

"We're beginning to jell offensively and defensively because the players are starting to realize their potential as a team. We did a real fine job today. I'm pleased."

The Gazelles play again Saturday against Rhode Island and Cortland in away games. Their record now stands at 2-0-1.

Fairfield staggers batmen; offense limited to five hits

By MIKE BERGER
Collegian Staff

A Fairfield freshman pitcher and a first-year walk-on utility outfielder put a damper on UMass baseball hopes as they combined to blow out the UMass nine, 15-5, before 50 spectators in action at Lorden Field yesterday.

Stag pitcher Joe Cizynski, previously named ECAC pitcher of the week for a no-hitter against Columbia, allowed the Minutemen only five hits as he picked up his third win of the season, pitching 8 and two thirds innings.

Outfielder Rick Diotalevi, a first-year player who has never been on a college team before, and threatened to leave the Fairfield team only a week ago, hit for the cycle as he drove in eight runs.

Diotalevi, only hitting .110 up until last week, collected a three-run homer in addition to run producing double, triple and single.

"Rick's a walk-on outfielder who's a pre-med student and because he felt he couldn't hit college ball threatened to leave the team last week," said Fairfield coach Don Cook.

UMass coach Dick Bergquist felt that Cizynski's pitching performance would have been disastrous against a much better-hitting ball club.

"Cizynski is a good fastball pitcher who was tough when he had to be today. But against a good hitting college team, his eight walks would have hurt him. I was very disappointed with our bats and defense today. If we had better results on those ends, we would have beaten him today," said Bergquist.

Bergquist sent freshman pitcher Doug Welenc to the mound and the 6'2" righthander, coming off a back injury, pitched creditably. Welenc allowed seven hits, and gave up five runs, and walked five. He left the game in the sixth trailing 3-0.

Diotalevi, leading off for the now 12-9 Stags in the fifth, hit a fly ball to left which leftfielder Paul Abramowicz lost in the sun for a double. He advanced to third on a ground out and then scored as teammate Frank Gill beat out a grounder to first.

Welenc didn't get anybody out in the sixth as he was touched up for a homerun, a walk and a sharp single to left. Lefty reliever Dave Tewhill came in to get the next man out on a ground ball but surrendered a two-run triple to Diotalevi. Gene Divito then lined a shot to right-fielder Mike McEvilly who made a tumbling catch. The Fairfield runner prematurely tagged up before the catch was made and crossed the plate. He was called out and a vehement argument ensued between the Fairfield coach and the umpire.

Somehow this inspired the UMass bats as they clicked for three runs in the last of the sixth to
